The Believer

אמא של מיכלאנג'לו:

אמא של אלברט איינשטיין:

By CHARLES HELLER

The blood libel was invented about a thousand years ago and has been periodically vanishing and reappearing ever since. The past year has seen some new twists and turns in this millennial story.

The blood libel is the accusation that Jews kill Christian children and use their blood, particularly for baking matzot. This libel runs through history, from Little St. Hugh of Lincoln in 1255 (not to be confused with Great St. Hugh, the Bishop of Lincoln who protected the Jews) to the Beilis case (1911) and Leo Frank (1915).

The case that concerns us here is that of Leopold Hilsner from the small Czech town of Polna (then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire). Hilsner was accused of the "ritual murder" of young Anezka Hruzova on the eve of Passover 1899. Despite being defended by T. G. Masaryk (who later became the first president of Czechoslovakia), he was found guilty and sentenced to death, though his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment after international protests. Released in the general amnesty of 1918, he later adopted the name of Heller after his guardian (my grandfather, Siegfried Heller). He died in Vienna in 1928.

This important case split society and became known as the "Czech Dreyfus Case." The miserable saga contains two key elements: it was the only such case in Austro-Hungarian history that resulted in a guilty verdict, and the verdict was never annulled, so that the accusation of ritual murder still remains on the books. That is why you will read in today's Arab press that Jews drink Arab or Christian blood or use it for matzot or even, in the latest twist, use it to bake hamantashen. These allegations have all appeared as fact in the Arab press within the last year.

The faint glimmer of hope is that many people of goodwill, Jewish and non-Jewish, will not let this case go away. Just a few months ago, the Austrian Social Democratic Party raised the issue of annulling the verdict against Hilsner, although without effect. (In contrast, the Czech Law Courts have annulled the verdict in their records.) And just this past April, a plaque was dedicated outside Hilsner's apartment building in Vienna, thanks to the tireless efforts of Petr Vasicek. This plaque, in Hebrew, Czech and German, reads: "The last dwelling of Leopold Hilsner, who languished in prison for 19 years as an innocent victim of the blood libel."

The guests at the dedication ceremony included representatives from the City of Vienna, the IKG (Viennese Jewish community), the Jewish community in Brno (Czech Republic) and the German Embassy in Vienna.

The striking aspect of the Hilsner case is the split in people's attitudes: even among

Jews, there are those who think Hilsner must have been guilty of something. Why, then, should non-Jews go out on a limb to support the Hilsner case, especially in these times when there is so much public pressure to attack Israel and the wider Jewish community?

I believe the answer lies in the deep human need to acknowledge the truth. Czechs in particular respond to this. Having undergone centuries of repression and lies, first under the Austrian Empire, then under the Nazis and the Soviets, Czechs want to know the truth about their past. They are led to the history of Masaryk and to Hilsner. Who was this Jewish nobody? Why did Masaryk risk his career to defend him? The quest is summed up in the old Czech motto Pravda zvitezi – the truth will triumph.

Charles Heller is the choir director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto and a teacher with the Peel District School Board. He is also a consultant editor for the Cantors Assembly of New York.

City of History and Mystery

There's a different atmosphere in Tzfat (known as Safed in English) and it's not just because this ancient city, 200 kilometers north of Jerusalem, is 900 meters above sea level. It's because Tzfat, where mysticism is natural, makes mundane concerns seem trivial. According to religious tradition, the son and grandson of Noah established a centre of religious learning here. In the 16th century, Tzfat was home to towering religious leaders, such as Rabbi Yitzhak Luria, the leading teacher of Kabbalah, and Rabbi Yoseph Karo, who codified Jewish law in the Shulchan Aruch. Just two centuries later, an earthquake and an epidemic nearly decimated Tzfat, but today its majesty and mystery envelop visitors. So here are a few sightseeing suggestions:

The Artist's Colony – Tzfat's cobblestone alleyways are lined with small studios and galleries that attract thousands of tourists. There's also a general exhibition of works by artist colony members, which is housed in a former mosque from the early 1900's.

The Doll Museum – In 1994, founder Mila Rozenfeld built the museum in memory of her daughter. Here, you'll find custom-crafted porcelain dolls, with intricate, hand-made historical costumes.

Beit Hameiri (Hameiri House) – This historical museum documents the life of Tzfat's Jewish community over the last 200 years.

As for accommodations, both bed and breakfast and hotel lodging are readily available. Visit www.safed.co.il/hotels.html for more details.

YMHA reunion will rekindle memories for club members

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Hail, hail, the gang's all here!

Memories of the old gang will prevail at The Y All-Clubs reunion and buffet dinner, which will bring together members of all the early YMHA clubs, going back more than half a century.

"The reunion will feature hundreds of wall-to-wall characters like you've never seen before," says Ken Borden, a member of the planning committee.

The first reunion to be organized in 28 years, it will be held Oct. 22 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre's (BJC) Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

First reunion set for BJC

The first clubs were formed in the 1940s at the YMHA's building at 15 Brunswick Ave. Some of the earliest clubs were Kenton, Dumaurier, Desmond, Baldwin, Gaylord and Daragon. In addition to the Brunswick Avenue building, the clubs began to meet at facilities at 12 Major St. and 44 St. George St., and in two houses at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, at the site of the current Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

When the Bloor Y opened in 1953, more groups were formed with younger members, and members of the original groups became the leaders. Seventeen boys' clubs and several girls' clubs were formed over the years.

"Anti-Semites played a huge role in the formation of the clubs' social and athletic activities, which included basketball and football, because there were so many places that restricted us or did not welcome us," says David (Sonny) Langer, a member of the planning committee.

"We were comfortable together. We felt secure and safe. The clubs became our extended families. That was the main part of our lives."

In an interview, Borden and Langer explained that the clubs became a centre of their world where they had a great deal of fun and also supported each other through tragedies and losses.

"In those days, no one had cars, so we spent time at the club or we walked on College Street, which was our promenade, where we met our friends," Borden said.

Despite divergent backgrounds, strong bonds were formed and many of the clubs still meet regularly for brunch or dinner. Borden said that when the members of Kenton meet once a month for breakfast, "it's as if no time has elapsed – we just continue where we left off."

"The club kept us out of trouble," Langer said. "It saved our lives. We were very busy with the athletics, putting on shows and socials, and we had fund-raising events."

Photos, old posters, old sweaters and other memorabilia will be on view when old friends gather at the reunion to share memories.

"We have come full circle and come back to our roots," Langer said. "With aging, more than ever, we want to hold on to our relationships.

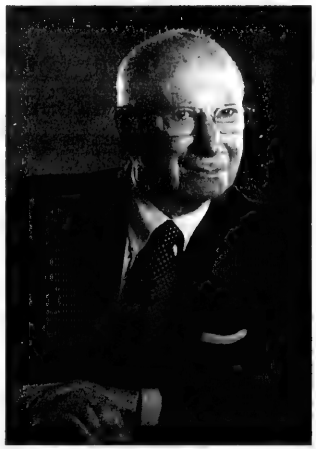
'Mr. Baycrest' urges donors to keep on giving

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN



Sam Ruth

Sam Ruth, 81, known by many as "Mr. Baycrest," fulfils the definition of a pacesetter – a person who leads the way and serves as a model for others.

Despite having had heart surgery last year, Ruth, a former executive director of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and founding president of the Baycrest Foundation, recently completed a 50-km bicycle ride as the oldest cyclist in a leg of the Barrie-to-Baycrest fundraiser.

His pacemaker has not slowed him down. "Now that I have a pacemaker, I worry less about my heart rate as I continue my physical activities and continue with my community responsibilities," he said.

Ruth retired in December 2000 after a 44-year career at Baycrest, leaving an indelible mark on elder care in Toronto's Jewish community and around the world.

"I believe that age can be ageless," said Ruth. "Therefore, each of us should continue to grow and be active and contribute to society regardless of what the calendar says."

To honour Ruth, Baycrest recently launched a planned giving program called the Sam Ruth Legacy Society.

"This reflects Sam's years of service and dedication to caring for the elderly in a compassionate and dignified way," said Florence Weinberger, Baycrest's director of development.

"Each gift makes a difference not only in the lives of Baycrest clients but also in the lives of the donors. It is an opportunity to leave a legacy for generations to come."

When asked why he lent his name to the new fund-raising project, the modest Ruth replied: "Baycrest depends on it."

Ruth believes in planned giving and spoke of his commitment and the commitment of others to include Baycrest in their wills.

"Baycrest's accomplishments have been made possible by people who preceded us. Therefore, it is now our duty to make sure that tomorrow's are well financed in the future."

Ruth said people who leave a gift to Baycrest in their will can expect to become members of the Sam Ruth Legacy Society. Members will be listed in the Baycrest Annual Review and have their name prominently displayed on Baycrest's Donor Recognition Wall. They will also receive a special gift.

"It is up to us to plant the seeds and to nurture them so that our children and grandchildren will benefit from the trees, just as we benefit from the generation who came before us," Ruth said.

Pacemaker fails to slow Ruth

Baycrest also made Ruth an honorary director, a rank that includes prominent volunteers who have retired from active involvement, retired members of management, retired professionals and other Baycrest supporters.

"I feel very strongly that Baycrest wouldn't be the international leader in geriatric care it is today without the financial support gained in the past from planned giving," he said.

Ruth said he is delighted that he and his wife Nancy have remained active in the community and that his three sons, Daniel, Alan and John, all work in health care. "And with seven grandchildren, I have no choice but to be active."

First all-clubs reunion held in 1974

"In the good old days," he added, "everyone had a nickname. We were like Damon Runyon characters. Ken was Ken (the Mole) Borden, and there was Al (the Hawk) Lando, Mike (Honky) Baida, Joe (Pecker) Packman, Harry (Putch) Greenblatt, Jerry (Blackie) Hoffman, Lou (de Ape) Goodfield and the list goes on and on."

Borden said that after the first all-clubs reunion in 1974, "over the years, I have been bugged to do it again. They wanted to see and shmooze with the guys again. Like, who's around, who's left, who's doing what, who is married or not married anymore, who's in town and who's not, or where is he now?"

The price for dinner and drinks is $75, and net proceeds will go to the BJC.

For more information on the Y All-Clubs reunion, call Ken Borden, 416-224-8184, David Himelfarb, 416-929-3989, or Sonny Langer, 905-881-4356

U.S. college editors tour Israel

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — For college journalist Evan Wagner, a tour along the seam line separating Israel and the West Bank brought Israeli security concerns into focus in a way that following the situation from afar could not.

Recalling the view of the Mediterranean from a vantage point along the Green Line, Wagner said he was surprised by how close everything is.

The tour "made a lot of those issues clearer than they could ever be by looking at a map or watching it on CNN," said Wagner, 20, a senior at American University in Washington and a managing editor of the campus newspaper, The Eagle.

Wagner is one of eight college newspaper editors who recently travelled to Israel as part of an intensive two-week seminar organized by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

The program, now in its 10th year, had special resonance this time around, with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict spurring heated debate – and tensions – on many American campuses.

This year's mission, which took place from Aug. 5 to Aug. 18, included college newspaper editors from American University, University of Michigan, Harvard University, University of California at Irvine, Oregon State University, Syracuse University, Wayne State University and Texas A&M University.

The group of editors visited Poland and Bulgaria as well as Israel on a program that was also designed to educate student journalists about the Holocaust and the Jewish State in general.

Wagner said he hoped the trip would help him provide context for his newspaper's coverage of campus activism related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"A trip like this, for me, translates into being able to put together better-informed [content]," he said.

While in Israel, the group toured Jerusalem, the northern region and the seam line separating Israel and the West Bank. They visited holy sites and museums, stayed on a kibbutz, were briefed by Foreign Ministry and defence officials and met with Israeli peers.

They heard from a diverse group of speakers, including Israeli legislators, Israeli Arab and Druze leaders, a representative from a regional settlement council in the West Bank, and Israeli, American and Palestinian members of the media.

Chatting in the lobby of a Jerusalem hotel on the last day of the seminar, the students said they were drawn to the program because of the opportunity it gave them to learn about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict up close.

"I believe very strongly that to understand any country, any place, any conflict, you have to see it first-hand," said Mariano Castillo, 22, a senior at Texas A&M University.

Unlike the other program participants, for whom this was their first trip to Israel, Castillo came here last winter on a mission organized by the American Jewish Committee.

"If there's one thing I learned when I came in December, it was that one trip is not enough to understand all the complexities of Israel and of the conflict," he said.

For Castillo, one of the highlights of the week in Israel was a meeting with Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna shortly after he declared his candidacy for leadership of the Labor Party.

"It was really great to meet a leader of that calibre, someone who's going to be a player in the next year or so and get his thoughts on where the country needs to go," said Castillo, who will be writing this year for the campus newspaper, The Battalion, after serving as its editor-in-chief.

"Seeing that they are our age, that most of them are kids just like us, really changed my perspective on how things work here," said Hanink, 20, who is editorial page editor of The Michigan Daily.

Ken Jacobson, assistant national director of the ADL, said the main point of the program is to "expose people to a diversity of viewpoints."

While past groups spent some time in the territories, that was not possible this year because of the security situation, Jacobson said.

"We tried to find ways to compensate," such as arranging a meeting with a Palestinian speaker, he said.

The ongoing violence in the region also affected the size of the study mission, which had fewer participants than in previous years.

While some of the students admitted that their families had expressed concern about their coming to Israel, personal safety was not a major concern for them.

"There are millions of people living here, who are managing with all the terrorism and conflict to live somewhat normal lives, or at least lives," said David DeBartolo, 21, a senior at Harvard University.

"If they can do it, the least I can do to learn about the way they're living is to come for a week and see it with my own eyes."

DeBartolo and other student editors said their school papers' coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict split into two categories: wire copy on actual news events and original reporting on how the dispute is playing out among campus interest groups.

At the University of Michigan, "there are a lot of people who feel like they have a large personal investment in what's happening here," said Hanink. "So that has bred a lot of activism and tension on the campus," which she said is addressed by her newspaper.

"Our editorial policy is unique in that in our unsigned editorials we never take a position on international affairs," she said. "But we view the role of those unsigned editorials to define the borders of acceptable debate on campus. We encourage both the Palestinian and Israeli activist groups to be vocal, to have a presence, but when one of those groups says something that we feel goes too far, we point that out."

Hanink said that if prior to the trip she might have hesitated over whether to run a particular opinion piece, "this trip has helped me define my own boundaries for what are the acceptable extremes."

DeBartolo, who is editorial chair of The Harvard Crimson, described a "politically charged" atmosphere on campus at the end of last year that was fuelled by distrust between Jewish and Arab student groups.

He said he hoped to be a better-informed editor as a result of the trip.

Calendar to raise funds for Jewish heritage centre

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's new activity book and 2003 day planner highlights a century of Jewish education in Manitoba in words and pictures.

The 250-page coiled publication includes 101 archival photos taken in school settings – class photos, athletic events, performing arts and other school activities – along with a brief history of Jewish schools in Winnipeg written by JHC director Stan Carbone.

The book also has write-ups about the centre and its components, a list of holidays, calendars for 2003 and 2004 and coupons at the back. And there will be weekly prize draws for supporters who buy the books, which cost $25.

The book is intended to be a fund-raiser for the JHC.

"Most museums receive some government assistance," says JHC president Gerry Posner. "We don't. We have to raise our own money. For most projects, we raise funds for the specific project. This book is our first independent fund-raiser.

"It has the potential to make us more self-reliant."

JHC fund-raising chairperson Rona Davies echoes the sentiment. "We could potentially raise as much as $50,000 if we can sell 2,000 books," she says.

The activity book was actually Davies' idea. Originally from Winnipeg, Davies grew up in Toronto and Montreal and had lived much of her adult life in Alberta, where she was involved in community work and fund-raising. She and her husband, Stephen, a research scientist, moved to Winnipeg three years ago. She has been a member of the JHC board for about a year.

The activity book was an idea she adapted from a similar project she had been involved with in Alberta. She notes that because all the photos are sponsored by donors, and because other donors, in particular the I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust, contributed to the cost of publication, all proceeds from sales can go directly to the JHC.

"The Winnipeg Jewish community's greatest export has been our people," Davies says. "A lot of those who have left still have family here. A heritage book like this should appeal to former Winnipeggers."

Posner says the book has value for both readers and the JHC.

"Our organization benefits from the sales and the publicity while people who buy copies of the book have the opportunity to win over $3,300 worth of prizes," he says. "This is a project that we can do year after year."

BATHURST JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTRE

CLC to meet with Palestinian labour officials

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Some time this fall, likely in November, Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) president Ken Georgetti will travel to the Palestinian territories to meet with senior labour officials there.

The CLC, he explained, has been "in more regular contact" with the Palestinian labour movement than its Israeli counterpart. While in Israel, he's hopeful he can arrange similar meetings with members of the Histadrut, Israel's labour movement. In his three years as president of the CLC, he said, he has yet to encounter anyone from the Histadrut.

That admission will no doubt strike many in the Jewish community as odd, given that the Histadrut maintains a presence on the local labour scene and Jews have historically played a prominent role in the Canadian labour movement. As well, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the community's umbrella organization, evolved to a large extent thanks to the efforts of Jewish workers, noted Bernie Farber, executive-director of CJC's Ontario region.

But, Georgetti pointed out, while at one time the CJC included an active labour caucus that maintained good ties between Jewish workers and the CLC, those ties seem to have been neglected in recent years.

Georgetti met Sept. 19 with CJC president Keith Landy in Ottawa in what both men described as a cordial and informative encounter.

Dialogue, Georgetti said, coupled with a description of the facts, is important to dispel "rumours" that the CLC had become anti-Semitic and anti-Israel. (One of the CLC's main critics at its Vancouver convention in June was former CLC president Dennis McDermott, who alleged anti-Semitism was creeping into the labour movement.)

For his part, Landy said the meeting with Georgetti afforded him the opportunity to express CJC's view that a resolution passed at the CLC's convention was "highly improper" and "filled with moral equivalence," condemning Palestinian terrorism in the same breath as Israel's response to it.

On that point, the two sides appeared to remain divided, as Georgetti maintained the CLC resolution was fair and even-handed in its approach to the Middle East conflict. He said it called on both sides to restrain themselves and urged Canada to push for international peace-keepers to police the area and allow both sides to resume peace negotiations.

Landy said he was also concerned about a policy statement adopted by the CLC's executive that compared Israel to South Africa under apartheid – a statement "that imported the language of Durban."

But Georgetti said the policy statement was no more than a discussion document that "does not form our policy. That policy is formed in formal resolutions."

Both sides acknowledged that the relationship between the two organizations needs more work – more meetings and more dialogue.

"It's clear we need to get more aggressive in that area unless we are prepared to write off the labour movement," Landy said. "I don't think we are going to do that. Now is the time to build a common ground."

At one time the Jewish community had stronger ties to the labour movement, Landy continued. While that has changed, many Jews remain active in local union politics and "I'm cautiously optimistic we can re-build the relationship."

Farber said Congress is in the process of scheduling meetings with "members of our community in the union movement and on the left, to link with them and work with them on approaches we'll make to various unions."

The goal of the meetings is to discuss Israel advocacy and ways of introducing a more favourable view of Israel in the wider labour movement, he added.

Congress was jarred out of its complacency this summer when an emergency resolution was adopted by the Ontario regional convention of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) that critics said was biased against Israel.

CUPE has explained the flags were taken without permission, Farber said. But he noted that Palestinian workers and Palestinian friendship groups have helped influence the Ontario labour movement to take positions critical of Israel.

Jews in the labour movement can help redress that imbalance, he said.

"People on the left are still ardent Zionists and they want a way to advocate for Israel in a communal context.

"CJC and the Jewish community has to some extent let this element of the Jewish community down.

Hebrew U seminar not welcome at Concordia

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The local president of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) says it's "a measure of the desperation" of the Concordia University administration that an academic seminar his group was to hold at the Loyola campus Oct. 6 will not be allowed to go ahead.

Lewis Dobrin said he received verbal notice Sept. 19 from Concordia Jewish studies professor Ira Robinson that rector Frederick Lowy had decided the day-long public event, titled The Pursuit of Brilliance: The Best of Hebrew U, fell under Concordia's definition of a Mideast-related activity banned under the current moratorium on such events.

Lowy imposed the moratorium Sept. 9 after violent protests forced the cancellation of a speech at Concordia by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The seminar features six Hebrew U professors giving a total of 16 lectures on topics such as medicine, technology, Jewish thought, law and political science, as well as the Mideast crisis.

"This event is not political at all, it is scholarly… I think the administration feels it not only has to show no bias, but has to have the appearance of showing no bias," Dobrin said.

Dobrin said the CFHU signed a contract with Concordia in July for the space at Loyola. The university was not charging the group, he said.

The event will now take place at McGill University's law faculty, which will charge the group for the space.

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said the event was cancelled because it "contravenes the moratorium guidelines," and said Concordia offered to help find another location for it.

Dobrin said the CFHU had to scramble to find a new venue and inform the 3,000 people who received a seminar brochure in the mail about the change.

He acknowledged some seminar topics could be considered political.

Political science professor Meron Medzini will discuss Israel – Two Years of Intifadah and the Peace Options for Israel. Another political scientist, Reuven Hazan, will discuss Public Opinion and the Peace Process: From Golda Meir to Rabin and now Sharon, and Democracies at War: Lessons from Israel.

The day will conclude with a plenary session on Israel in Crisis, moderated by Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler.

But most of the program deals with such areas as women's rights in Judaism, brain research, Israel's hi-tech industry and the role of Israel's Supreme Court.

The event was to have been held in co-operation with Concordia's Jewish studies department.

The event is not a fund-raiser. In fact, Dobrin said, it is "a money-loser," because of the cost of bringing in the professors and publicizing the event. But the last-minute switch may attract people, he said, because the Concordia cancellation has people talking about it.

Hillel city-wide president Yoni Petel called the cancellation "disgusting… It's not just students affected [by the moratorium], now it's academics. How far will it go?"

But Petel said the change of venue of last week's "community rally/Hakafot Shniot celebration in support of Jewish students and democracy at Concordia" was not due to the moratorium.

Petel said reasons included the fact that police would not issue a permit for a march after dark and that the McGill planning office advised Hillel it does not allow outside groups to hold such gatherings on its premises.

A B'nai Brith Canada delegation was received at Premier Bernard Landry's Montreal office last week and asked that the province conduct an inquiry into the Sept. 9 events at Concordia University.

Speaking to reporters outside the Hydro-Québec building, B'nai Brith's national legal counsel Steven Slimovitch said a government-appointed inquiry is the only body that can subpoena witnesses and ascertain why the protest against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu turned violent.

The violence at Concordia's Hall Building led to the cancellation of Netanyahu's planned speech there. Slimovitch said he hoped an inquiry would examine what led up to the protest and recommend ways to prevent a similar incident from recurring.

B'nai Brith believes everyone involved should be questioned, including the university administration, the police, officials from the city and other levels of government, as well as demonstrators and student organizations.

B'nai Brith Quebec region executive director Saulie Zajdel said "nothing spectacular" came out of the meeting with Roy, "who said he would discuss the issue with Landry. "That's all we could hope for," Zajdel said.

Roy said Landry is not commenting on B'na' Brith's request for an inquiry, which he said has been forwarded to the Procureur General for consideration.

Sentence boosted for Edmonton shul arsonist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

EDMONTON – Almost two years ago, as Jewish communities around the world were being rocked by anti-Semitic attacks in the wake of the latest Palestinian intifadah, the Beth Shalom Synagogue in Edmonton was struck by a Molotov cocktail.

The firebomb succeeded in shattering one of the shul's windows and starting a small fire, but before Yousef Sandouga could throw his second incendiary device, things began to go awry.

Instead of lighting the second Molotov cocktail, the then-20-year-old Palestinian only succeeded in setting his own clothes on fire. Panic-stricken, he rolled around on the grass next to the shul, trying to put the fire out. He succeeded in doing so, but not before the cellphone he was carrying fell to the ground.

Alerted by the commotion, the synagogue caretaker, who lived in a residence next to the synagogue, arrived in time to see Sandouga flee. Police were quickly called to the scene, where they recovered the abandoned cellphone.

Then, as if trying to make the police officers' jobs easier, Sandouga attempted to retrieve the phone.

According to a recent Alberta Court of Appeal decision, police "soon received a number of angry and threatening phone calls. One caller identified the cellphone as Sandouga's and provided his address for its return."

Police later determined that Sandouga, who was born in Jordan and who immigrated with his family to Canada at age 7, had been treated in hospital for second degree burns.

Sandouga was located with the help of "elders in the Arabic community" and at trial, pleaded guilty to charges of arson. He told the court he considered himself a Palestinian and had acted against the Edmonton Jewish community "out of frustration with events in the Middle East."

Sandouga was sentenced to one year in jail followed by three years of probation. He also arranged for a restitution payment of $1,100, though the court noted "it is not clear from the record whether Sandouga himself paid it."

Both the Crown and Sandouga appealed the sentence – the Crown arguing it was insufficient, Sandouga contending it was too harsh.

In a unanimous decision released recently, a three-justice panel of the Alberta Court of Appeal boosted Sandouga's jail time to 2½ years in a federal penitentiary.

In doing so, the court employed extremely powerful language, saying "Sandouga's act of revenge-based arson was a terrorist act, a hate crime and an act of religious intimidation."

Moreover, "because of the nature of the offence, Sandouga may pose a threat to the community."

Writing for the court, Judge Adelle Fruman said Sandouga's crime "chips away at our human dignity, our fundamental freedoms, our multicultural tolerance and our sense of safety and security. All Canadians are entitled to live, gather and worship without fear of attack. To protect these shared values, to discourage anarchy and to maintain confidence in the judicial system, courts must mete out penalties that sternly denounce hate crimes and terrorist acts, and deter others from expressing their views through dangerous acts of intimidation."

The court rejected Sandouga's claims the arson was a spontaneous act that resulted from too much drinking. The judgment noted that he had obtained a can of gasoline and had collected bottles and wicks earlier in the day. He had then located a synagogue and proceeded there after midnight, dressed in dark clothing and a toque. Furthermore, he had discussed the firebombing with other people, all of whom had attempted to dissuade him from carrying it out.

The pre-sentence report noted that Sandouga denied full responsibility for the crime, claiming "'it was not really me who did it,' because he had consumed alcohol and used marijuana that evening."

The arson took place on Nov. 1, 2000, about a month after the start of the second Palestinian intifadah.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded the Appeal Court decision, as well as the Crown's efforts. "We are very gratified at the seriousness with which the Crown prosecutor in Edmonton, John Hnidan, approached this case and we have expressed our appreciation to him for this," said Manuel Prutschi, Congress' national director of community relations.

Firebombing led to links between Muslims and Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Sol Rolingher's world view, it's important to try to turn a negative into a positive. So when he heard in early 2001 that the suspect in his shul's November 2000 firebombing was a young Muslim, his first impulse was to open lines of communication to Edmonton's 30,000-strong Muslim community.

At the time, things were getting hot for Jewish communities around the world and the last thing he wanted to see was Edmonton's 4,500 Jews subject to attacks. (In addition to the attack on the Beth Shalom, a second Edmonton synagogue, the Beth Israel, was firebombed the same night and two suspects were seen fleeing the scene. No arrests have been made in that case.)

As a lawyer with a number of voluntary involvements in the broader community, "I knew a number of prominent Muslims," he said. "I wanted to reach an understanding so that we can live in harmony.

"Our community," he continued, "is so vulnerable."

Finding a willing ear on the Muslim side, a meeting was held and common ground – which included tolerance of the other community and a live-and-let live attitude – was found.

What's more, members of the Muslim community subsequently helped to locate Yousef Sandouga, the suspect in the Beth Sholom firebombing. Sandouga had been released on bail and then disappeared, missing a court date. Police believed he had left the country, but Muslim elders tracked him down in Edmonton, Rolingher said.

"The imams [Muslim religious leaders] felt [Sandouga] embarrassed and brought shame on their community," Rolingher said.

In addition to establishing friendly relations with the city's Muslims, Rolingher approached Edmonton police to ask for enhanced protection. His queries eventually led to the creation of Edmonton's hate bias squad, consisting of two city police officers and an RCMP officer.

Police subsequently stepped up surveillance of Jewish community facilities and ironically, it was the hate bias squad that was called on to protect Muslim institutions in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terror attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

Police are also planning to host a meeting aimed at bringing the two communities closer together and ensuring political issues from outside Canada don't inflame tensions in the city, Rolingher added.

As to Beth Sholom's congregation, he said the firebombing led to record High Holy Day attendance as well as an increase in family memberships.

"I think people wanted to pray together, to show solidarity and to show Edmonton we're here and no one is going to make us not [pray together]," he said.

Feds say they won't change policy on Nazis

Several suspects died while their cases were before the courts, and two left the country voluntarily. Only one person has been deported. Three have seen their citizenship removed but have not yet been deported.

Jewish groups reacted angrily to news the government had considered changing the deportation process. But, they said, they were not surprised.

Leo Adler, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's director of national affairs, said "the government never wanted to do anything more than the bare minimum ...I would not be surprised if no further cases come up."

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Congress met last week with the minister and was told there would be no change in policy. "My comment is there must have been something that prompted the story, and if it's that the government intends not to proceed with deportation, it would be a real shame and a slap in the face to the Jewish community, Holocaust survivors and the community in general."

Landy suggested the government lacked "political will and backbone" to deal with Nazi war crimes suspects.

What's more, he said,"how could Canada deal with modern day war criminals in any credible way if it now decides not to proceed with deportation?"

Adler speculated the government was considering allowing Nazis to remain in Canada because "they felt embarrassed by pictures of old men coming into court." He contrasted that attitude to one involving sexual assault suspects brought to court 30 or 40 years after the alleged offense took place, where no such reticence existed.

"I think they feel they can do it [not deport] at this stage and the unfortunate reality is that we can raise a fuss and be listened to, but Canadian Jews don't have substantial impact with the exception of at most two ridings in the country, and the government feels they don't need those two ridings," Adler said.

The issue became a political hot potato for the government when a court ruled more than two years ago that Kitchener developer Helmut Oberlander entered the country by lying about his service as an interpreter in a Nazi murder unit. Kitchener-Waterloo MP Andrew Telegdi (Lib.) jumped to Oberlander's defence, alleging the deportation process was politicized. He urged the government to change the law to allow a judge to make the final decision on deportation.

Oberlander's case remains stalled in cabinet, which has the authority to strip Nazi war criminals of their citizenship prior to deportation.

Hornbrook and MacDonald: a study in contrasts

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Listening to Mike Hornbrook's reports on CBC Radio (Sept. 22) describing Israel's siege of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Ramallah compound makes one keenly aware of just how skewed so much of Neil Macdonald's reporting for the CBC has become.

Hornbrook began by describing in neutral terms the siege itself, and the extent of the destruction to Arafat's compound ("Israeli tanks and troops are closer to Yasser Arafat than they have ever been. Armoured bulldozers are slowly grinding away at what remains of his headquarters… ").

Hornbrook then described Israel's demand that 20 of 200 men holed up with Arafat be turned over. "[Israel] says that they are wanted for involvement in terrorism." But Hornbrook didn't stop there. He added relevant context: "All this comes after back-to-back suicide bombings in Israel last week left 5 Israelis and a foreigner dead."

Hornbrook paid attention to the Palestinian appeal for help and to their claim that "the Palestinian leader may be killed in the siege." Yet he also included quotes from Israeli spokesperson Dore Gold, who defended Israel's actions and explained that only those involved in terrorism against Israelis, not Arafat himself, are the targets.

Hornbrook's report was both revealing and scrupulously fair. It presented both sides impartially, as is demanded by CBC's broadcast regulations of its reporters. If Hornbrook has a personal opinion (and one can assume he does), listeners would never know what it is.

Later that day, Neil Macdonald reported for CBC Radio. He focused only on Israel's destruction of Arafat's compound and on harm to Palestinian interests. Virtually no Israeli perspective, nor context to its actions, was provided. Macdonald's tone and snide editorial comment ("Sharon has always believed that peace-making is best done at gunpoint") signaled to listeners his disapproval of Israel – a disapproval we're familiar with from his TV news reports. Have we ever heard Macdonald opine that for Arafat, diplomacy is best achieved through bombs?

The most glaring omission of context is evident in Macdonald's report for Foreign Assignment on CBC Newsworld (Sept. 14). His story accused Israel of exploiting the tragedy of Sept. 11 in order to "pounce" on Arafat and the Palestinians. Macdonald omitted mention of the unrelenting spate of terror attacks Israel had endured with great self-restraint in the preceding year.

He also failed to note that it was not until six months after Sept. 11, following a suicide bombing at a Passover seder in a Netanya hotel, that Israel finally felt compelled to go into the West Bank. In effect, he collapses the time frame and reverses the causal order of events, leaving viewers with a very stilted impression of what transpired.

A spokesperson presents the Palestinian case, and a highly respected Israeli academic, Ehud Sprinzak, is also heard criticizing Israel's actions. No countervailing view is presented. Viewers cannot be faulted for assuming that Israel is wantonly and ruthlessly oppressive.

In their avoidance of relevant context, these reports violate CBC's journalistic guidelines on integrity and fairness. What's more, CBC management seems fully supportive. Indeed, in its promotion of a feature item by their Middle East correspondent (the first instalment in the three-part series Stories From The War Zone, Sept. 17), CBC actually boasts (contrary to its own ban on reporters expressing viewpoints) that Neil Macdonald is "well known for his definitive views."

Someone should tell the CBC that Neil Macdonald is not Rex Murphy. Nor is he allowed to be. Actually, many people have. Our public broadcaster apparently does not care, but all Canadian viewers should.

Settlement marks 25th birthday amid security concerns

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Rivki Sabo knows what it's like to feel vulnerable

The former Montrealer and her family – husband Itzy and two sons Zvi, 6, and Eitan, 4 – live on a settlement in the heart of the West Bank that has faced its share of terror since the intifadah started almost two years ago.

Three members of the yishuv, popularly called Neve Tzuf but also known as Halamish, have been killed on the by-pass road leading to Tel Aviv, about 40 minutes to the west. One of the victims lived across the street from Sabo. The yishuv is also just a stone's throw from several Palestinian towns.

Sabo said there have been "countless injuries" on the road, one that is regularly used by her husband to commute to Tel Aviv and his job in computer software security. The car's only protection are windows that can't be shattered by rocks.

The yishuv itself is surrounded by a fence that keeps it "more or less" protected, said Sabo, a cheery woman of 32 who grew up in the "Young Israel" area of Montreal.

Her husband is a member of Neve Tzuf's anti-terrorist squad, which tries to protect residents in emergency situations until professional defence personnel arrive.

Sabo was in Montreal recently as part of a month-long trip to raise awareness about the settlement's security concerns.

Specifically, Sabo was trying to raise the $20,000 or so it would take to hire a private security guard for the yishuv's preschool facility. So far, she admitted, her success has been limited.

Despite an "incredibly difficult" last couple of years, Sabo, with her two sons playing peacefully at her feet, appears surprisingly content when talking about life back home.

She is quick to point out that she and her family did not choose to live in Neve Tzuf in 1996 out of any ideological or religious fervour or to make a "statement."

Although her family is Orthodox, she and her husband were drawn there because it is observant and has a mixture of ages and backgrounds, and is also relatively close to both Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. As well, it was well-established and they were able to build their own home.

"It felt natural to be there," Sabo said. "But if we had been able to find the same thing 10 minutes from Jerusalem or somewhere else, it could have been there too," Sabo said, "It could have been inside or outside the Green Line."

That being said, Sabo feels she and her family have every right to stay in "Yesha," the Hebrew acronym that settlers often use to refer to the West Bank.

"If the communities in Yesha go, so does the centre of the country," she said.

This year is Neve Tzuf's 25th anniversary, a celebration Sabo would not have predicted she would be part of while growing up in Montreal.

Born into a mainstream Orthodox family, Sabo attended the Beth Jacob School for Girls, and went to McGill and Concordia universities, as well as Hebrew University, where she earned a master's degree in library sciences.

Her first trip to Israel was in 1987, and she returned almost annually for educational and youth-oriented programs, as well as to attend a yeshiva in Jerusalem (Brovender's).

Sabo met her Israeli husband in the summer of 1990 at a program of Yavneh Olami, a politically unaffiliated international Orthodox student organization. But the couple did not get together permanently until two years later.

The day she made aliyah – Sept. 10, 1992 – was the same day they reunited and became engaged.

Sabo is currently helping to set up an archive for the community, which now boasts about 1,000 residents (200 families), including other former Canadians.

The yishuv also has full educational and medical facilities, with several plans in the works to reflect its continuing growth, such as separate Sephardi and Ashkenazi synagogues, a youth centre, and the yeshiva's first permanent structure.

'Green Line' policy on charities rejected by court

As Ottawa tax lawyer Arthur Drache, who represented CMDA, put it, "the operation was a success but the patient died."

He said CMDA will ask the Supreme Court of Canada to hear an appeal of the decision to allow the de-registration process to move forward. In the meantime, CMDA can continue to issue tax receipts for donations.

The Federal Court of Appeal ruling marks the first time a Canadian court has addressed the issue, and its remarks regarding the CCRA policy on the territories should have far-reaching implications for all Jewish groups that raise money for Israel in Canada, Drache said.

"It's a wildly important decision for Jewish organizations," he said. "It opens the doors to a lot of charities which would [otherwise] be at risk. If they're run properly, [the ruling implies] they can operate any place."

Potentially, that would include Canadian charities that raise funds for Jewish communities in the territories, Drache said. In theory, even organizations that have been stripped of their charitable status for having aided causes operating outside Israel's pre-1967 frontier could apply to have their status reinstated on the strength of this ruling, Drache said.

For more than 10 years, Canadian Jewish organizations working for Israel have been restricted to sending money and aid solely for use inside the so-called Green Line. They have long argued that the policy, implemented by the CCRA, is wrong.

It hasn't been illegal for individual Canadians to send money to organizations that operate in the post-1967 territories – only to claim it as a tax-deductible charitable donation, and for charities to issue tax receipts.

That's because the government's approach in this area has been driven by Canadian foreign policy, which does not recognize Israel's control over territories occupied in 1967.

The problem was especially acute in Jerusalem, which is bisected by the Green Line. Donors could get tax receipts for contributions to a school, synagogue or hospital in one part of the city, but not to another facility sometimes literally metres away.

Over the years, a number of Jewish charities have run afoul of the policy. In 1996, the Toronto Zionist Council was de-registered for funnelling money to Jewish settlements.

All three judges on the court held that the CCRA's position on the Green Line was wrong and that as a matter of law, there was no reason why charitable work could not be carried on both in Israel proper and beyond the 1967 border. In effect, the court found the position to be an incorrect interpretation of "public policy."

The court noted that Ottawa's approach has been based "on an interpretation of a number of United Nations resolutions and conventions, which have been consistently supported by Canada. However, it is far from clear that these resolutions support the proposition that a Canadian charitable organization cannot operate in the occupied territories without offending Canadian public policy."

In the case of CMDA, the court said it sees "no logic in the proposition that the provision of emergency medical assistance can be a charitable activity in downtown Tel Aviv but not in the occupied territories."

The court also noted the difficulty of reconciling the policy with the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement.

But mainly, the ruling took issue with the fact that Canada has relied on an unwritten policy.

Writing for the court, Justice Karen Sharlow found that "certainly no such policy has found expression in any act of Parliament, in any regulation, or in any publicly available government document of any kind. I have no doubt that it is open to Parliament, if it sees fit, to amend the Income Tax Act to preclude Canadian charities from operating in the Occupied Territories or any other part of the world, or to empower the Governor in Council [cabinet] to make regulations to that effect."

However, "in the absence of such legislation or some equally compelling public pronouncement, it seems to me that the [CCRA] cannot justify the revocation of the registration of [CMDA] solely on the basis that it operates in the occupied territories."

Drache called the court's comments "a vindication... the community should feel very good about this. Now, it's a whole new ball game."

Drache, who has represented other Jewish charities before the courts, has long maintained that tax officials "invented" the unwritten rules in 1991. He said they stem from the presumption that because Canada holds Israel's presence in the territories to be illegal, ordinary Canadians would reject tax-deductible donations to Israel-based groups that operate there.

In a recent column in the National Post, Drache noted that Ottawa's policy did not apply to non-Jewish groups that supported Christians or Muslim schools, churches and mosques in the same areas.

A 1998 letter from Revenue Canada said that providing infrastructure for Jewish communities in the territories "serves to encourage and enhance the permanency of settlements, and is therefore contrary to Canada's public policy."

But Ottawa has never enunciated a legally entrenched policy on charitable activity in the post-1967 territories. The issue never went to litigation before because of the high costs involved, Drache said.

"I've long said that the only way to change this is through the courts," as opposed to lobbying the government.

Drache has been involved in two other similar cases.

In 1999, the Toronto-based Press Foundation, which has raised millions of dollars for Jewish settlements, was stripped of its charitable status. It appealed, and the matter is still before the courts.

Drache said the Press Foundation could be helped by the finding in the CMDA case.

Also in 1999, the Tel Aviv Foundation, which raised funds for the municipality of Tel Aviv, was de-registered. An appeal failed, with the court ruling earlier this year that the foundation did not exercise sufficient control over its activities in Israel.

Drache said there is "some evidence" that the CCRA is "looking hard" at other Jewish organizations by conducting audits.

Israeli sign offered

The University of Haifa is offering a new language in its foreign language department – Israeli sign.

Wendy Sandler, a linguistics expert, and head of the university's sign language, linguistics, and cognition research laboratory, calls Israeli sign "the native language of deaf people in Israel."

The course will be given at the same intensive level as other foreign languages in the department.

Although Haifa is not the first university to offer the language, it will be the first to accord it the same status as other languages in the foreign language department.

Israeli sign language will be open to any student at Haifa University. It will be taught by someone whose native language is Israeli sign language, according to University officials.

Sandler, originally from the United States, recently co-authored a book in Hebrew on Israeli Sign Language. The pioneering volume received the Bahat Prize, one of Israel's literary awards for non-fiction works.

Ve'ahavta and the Canada Israel Experience offers you a trip to Israel to "roll up your sleeves" and play a role in tikun olam – repairing the world.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Amid a storm of domestic criticism of Israel's military siege of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's headquarters – abruptly lifted Sunday after requests from a White House fearful of disruption of its war plans for Iraq – Israeli officials said Monday that administration pressure to end the siege had been greater than Israel had anticipated.

Cabinet minister Natan Sharansky said government officials had failed to take into account how Washington would react to the operation as a possible hindrance to a future U.S. offensive against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

"We did not assess the situation correctly when we made the decision two weeks ago, the extent to which America had already begun the countdown to an attack on Iraq, that just during those days America would enter into confrontations with the UN and Europe, and would be unable to tolerate one more confrontation," Sharansky told Israel Radio.

"We certainly should have taken this into consideration two weeks ago."

Officials accompanying Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in Russia were quoted Monday by state-owned Israel Radio as conceding that the administration pressures "were greater than had been first anticipated." They added, however, that "had the siege not been lifted, the relations between the two countries [Israel and the U.S.] would have been harmed."

Sharansky said that prior to taking the decision to besiege Arafat, "there were no hints from Washington" as to its negative reaction to the operation.

"At the same time, there is no question that the [cabinet] decision was taken in undue haste, and that this was the result."

Trying to put a positive spin on the decision, Education Minister Limor Livnat said, "It took a certain courage as well to make the decision to accept the American demand and to get out. That also takes a certain judgement."

After security officials and the cabinet misjudged the situation, and Washington had demanded the siege be halted, Livnat said, "the prime minister, along with the defence minister and others, came to the cabinet and recommended [that the operation be ended], and this too was accepted unanimously. Was this good? No."

Livnat stressed that security officials had been part of the original cabinet decision to besiege Arafat.

"I listened to the entire discussion along with my colleagues in the cabinet, and I did not hear the security people, the figures of the various defence arms and institutions, voice reservations or present a scenario under which things could have turned out the way they ultimately did."

Asked how one could trust a government that had unanimously adopted a course of action that it now nearly unanimously admitted was a blunder – a term she herself used to describe the affair – Livnat told the radio: "First of all, the decision was not mistaken. The decision was a correct one. But we could not continue to commit ourselves to it because of the American pressure.

"Had the United States not appealed to us through channels and – because of its interests at the moment in preparing for a war against Iraq – if they hadn't pressed us in this manner, we would have continued, and, in my view, the wanted men would eventually have been handed over."

Israel's Army Radio reported Monday that security officials believed most of the wanted men escaped the compound after the army withdrew from the area.

UK Jews up in arms over media's Israel coverage

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Relations between British Jews and the British media have fallen to a new low in recent weeks after three anti-Israeli documentaries were broadcast on the three leading television channels.

Six weeks ago, Channel 4 ran Dangerous Liaison, about U.S.-Israeli relations. It was edited by Jacqueline Rose, one of the signatories to a petition calling on European universities to cut off scientific and cultural relations with Israel.

The BBC ran End of an Affair on the eve of the Jewish New Year, documenting Jewish MP Gerald Kaufman's reservations about Israel and its government policies, after he declared he would never set foot in Israel again.

And ITV ran Palestine Is Still the Issue, a film by John Pilger, one of the leading leftist writers in Britain. Israel was described as a violent apartheid state that had taken over Palestinian lands and sadistically tortures Palestinians.

Rose's documentary did not stir much interest – her anti-American posturing is well known – but the BBC treatment of Kaufman's trip to Israel and Pilger's documentary caused immense bitterness.

Kaufman, a Jewish Labour MP, was asked six months ago by the BBC to visit Israel to find out if his position had changed since he announced he would never set foot in the country again. He toured major cities and met Israelis and Palestinians, including senior officials. But he does not hide his negative feelings and opinions about the country.

"Not only has Jerusalem's unique skyline been raped," he says while touring the city. "But vast areas of the city have been taken over, infested by intolerant, ultra-Orthodox… self appointed guardians of the Jewish faith, [who] refuse to serve in the army that defends them. The Western Wall, a popular place for bar mitzvahs… for me, my bar mitzvah was an initiation into manhood… here … their bar mitzvahs… are not initiations into manhood, they are initiations into fundamentalism."

Pilger's film was commissioned a year ago by Steve Anderson, head of the news department at ITV. Pilger was asked to prepare a documentary on the same subject the writer had documented on film 25 years earlier. Pilger hired Ilan Peppe, an Israeli "new historian" as a consultant.

The film opens with the following statement: "Twenty-five years ago, I made a film called Palestine Is Still the Issue. It was about a nation of people, the Palestinians, forced off their land and later subjected to a military occupation by Israel – an occupation condemned by the UN and almost every country in the world, including Britain.

"But Israel is backed by a very powerful friend, the United States. Nothing has changed in 25 years, if we are to speak of the great injustice here. What has changed is that the Palestinians have fought back. Stateless and humiliated for so long, they have risen up against Israel's huge military machine, although they themselves have no army, no tanks, no American planes, no gunships or missiles. Some have committed desperate acts of terror like suicide bombing, but for Palestinians, the overriding routine terror, day after day, has been the ruthless control of every aspect of their lives, as if they live in an open prison."

He describes Operation Defensive Shield by saying, "Last April, troops and tanks of the Israeli army attacked Ramallah and other towns in occupied Palestine. This was reported as an 'incursion to stop terrorism.' In fact, it was also an attack on civilian life – on schools, offices, clinics, theatres, radio stations. This systematic vandalism is typical of one of the longest military occupation in modern times."

Pilger depicts Israel as capricious and sadistic. He describes the course of events leading to the current conflict with the Palestinians without any mention of the Camp David and Taba conferences, nor does he say that before the current conflict, tens of thousands of Palestinians worked inside Israel. And he accuses the Jewish people of a conspiracy to manipulate non-Jews, to make gentiles believe that any criticism of Israel is a form of anti-Semitism.

Hundreds of angry telephone calls to ITV, led Michael Green, chair of ITV's owner, Carlton Communications PLC, to tell the Jewish Chronicle that the documentary was "one-sided, it was totally unrealistic, but it was John Pilger… it was factually incorrect, historically incorrect… There's no doubt in my mind that this program is a tragedy for Israel so far as accuracy is concerned."

Jewish community leaders are in a quandary about how to respond. At first, Jewish community leaders considered pressing to get the shows dropped from the broadcasting schedule, but that idea was scotched for fear the pro-Israel lobby would be depicted as trying to gag criticism and censor what it didn't want heard.

Jo Wagerman, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, wrote to the BBC about The End of an Affair, complaining that Kaufman not only condemned the policies of the government of Israel, but also made many offensive comments about Jews and the Jewish religion. Wagerman told the BBC that such remarks were contrary to the BBC's producers' guidelines.

The board also complained to Carlton about Palestine Is Still the Issue, saying Pilger made no secret of his support and sympathy for the Palestinian cause.

In his complaint to the Independent Television Commission's board of deputies, the Board of Deputies of British Jews' director general Neville Nagler said the program portrayed "a one-sided view of the current conflict, focusing on Israel's alleged aggression and the plight of the Palestinian people. No effort was made to provide context or any kind of perspective from the standpoint of Israel.

"Pilger misrepresents Israel's wars in 1948 and 1967 as though they were initiated by Israel. He effectively accuses Jewish people of conspiring to manipulate the non-Jewish world into believing that any criticism of Israel is anti-Semitism. In view of the totally one-sided character of this program, we expect that, in the interests of balance and fairness, Carlton TV should apologize and present a film of corresponding length which portrays the recent history of Israel in an objective and fair-minded manner."

Kaufman, who was ostracized at his synagogue on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, told Ha'aretz he had received hundreds of letters of support since the documentary was broadcast.

The BBC said, "We listen to complaints very carefully, but we are satisfied about the impartiality of our coverage, which we view regularly. Kaufman was chosen because he is a Jew who also made a public vow never to return to Israel. So we thought to see whether he would be willing to go back once more, to explore why he feels so critically about the country and whether he still holds his views."

Russia's dangerous dealings with Iran go on

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

At his meeting Monday with Russian President Vladimir Putin, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was set to go through the ritual performed by all Israeli and American leaders during talks in Moscow: Sharon was to demand that Russia stop assisting Iran's nuclear program, and the Russians were ready to reply, as always, with smiles and understanding.

And afterward, the flow of Russian nuclear technology to Iran would continue.

Last month, an American delegation visited Moscow with a detailed list of all the technologies and raw materials supplied by Russia that could help Iran develop atomic, biological or chemical weapons or long-range missiles. It returned empty-handed, saying no progress would be made until U.S. President George Bush's upcoming summit with Putin. But Bush is currently focused on mustering support for his war on Iraq, and Iran has been pushed to the sidelines.

The United States has been trying for more than seven years to get Russia to end its dangerous dealings with Iran, but without success. The Russians did pledge to "tighten controls" on technology exports – but meanwhile, Iran's nuclear project and its long-range ground-to-ground missile project have both advanced.

Russian nuclear aid to Iran flows through two channels. The open one is its assistance in construction of the nuclear power plant in Bushehr, due to be completed by the end of next year. The secret one consists of Russian companies that supply know-how and parts that could aid in the production of nuclear weapons.

Time after time, the Russians have denied that such deals exist. Neither the United States nor Israel believes them.

Robert Einhorn and Gary Samore, who handled America's talks with Russia on this issue for the Clinton administration, analyzed this ongoing failure in an article published in the bulletin of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. In it, they note that America does not believe Russia's claim that these transfers of nuclear technology are a "private enterprise." The Americans believe that all such deals take place with the knowledge and consent of government agencies. Had the Russian government really wanted to, the writers contend, it could have turned off the tap – or at least reduced the flow substantially.

Russia, they said, actually shares America's reluctance to see Iran join the nuclear club, and privately, Russian officials even admit that they share America's assessment of Tehran's intentions.

But two considerations have caused Russia to prefer a partnership with Iran to strategic and technological co-operation with the United States. The first, they said, is economic: the Russian nuclear industry needs the Iranian market. The second is strategic: Russia views Iran as a key player in the Middle East, and also as one with influence on Russia's large Muslim minority. For both reasons, good relations with Tehran are important to it.

The two sides almost concluded a written agreement

Samore and Einhorn wrote that in late 2000 – just before Bill Clinton's presidency ended – the Americans were close to a deal with Moscow: Russia's then energy minister, Yevgeny Adamov, had agreed in principle to halt Russian cooperation with Iran in sensitive areas such as uranium enrichment and plutonium production in exchange for American acquiescence to Russia's role in the Bushehr project. The two sides almost concluded a written agreement, the article said, but the talks eventually foundered over Washington's fears that Adamov would not keep his word.

Samore and Einhorn also criticized the Bush administration for neglecting this issue, thereby making Russia think that the United States no longer cared about it. Recently, Bush's team has begun taking a more active stance. But Russia's position has not moved a millimetre.

During his two-day visit, Sharon was also scheduled to meet with Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov and heads of Russia's Jewish community.

One of the main issues Sharon was to have raised with officials was Russia's arms sales to Middle Eastern countries, particularly Syria.

Israel is concerned that Russia may sell Syria new surface-to-air S-18 missiles. Sharon will tell Putin that the missiles could end up in the hands of Hezbollah in South Lebanon.

Sharon was also set to ask Putin to use his influence on Syria to restrain Hezbollah. Also on the agenda regarding the Lebanese government were Israel's concerns about projects diverting water from the Wazzani River.

Putin and Sharon were also expected to discuss the leaking of nuclear technologies to Iran.

Accompanying Sharon on the visit were the outgoing head of the Mossad, Ephraim Halevy, and three Russian-born survivors of the suicide bombing at the Dolphinarium nightclub in Tel Aviv in June 2001.

Pro-Israel Web site criticized

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PHILADELPHIA — A pro-Israel group's Web site that monitors professors and universities for pro-Arab, anti-Israel bias is being likened to McCarthyism by many academics.

The Philadelphia-based Middle East Forum said it had organized the Campus Watch site to counter pervasive bias in universities' Middle East studies. The site names specific schools and professors. Forum director Daniel Pipes said the think tank hopes eventually to monitor 250 North American academic institutions.

"Our goal is to monitor, critique and improve Middle East studies," Pipes said. "We're not at universities because our views are not welcome. We're trying to create an alternative voice within the field."

Opponents of the Web site immediately called the project a "McCarthy-like" attempt to gag opposition to American policy in the Middle East. Professors listed on the site said they had been bombarded with e-mails over the weekend.

In a show of support for those named on the site, about 100 other academics have asked to be added to the list. Judith Butler, a gender theorist at Berkeley, wrote that she would like to be included in the list of U.S. academics "who oppose the Israeli occupation and its brutality, actively support Palestinian rights of self-determination" and support an informed view of Islam.

The Campus Watch site accuses some American Middle Eastern scholars of being biased against the United States and being apologists for unfriendly regimes.

University of Chicago historian Rashid Khalidi, who is quoted on the Web site as sympathizing with the Palestinian cause, called the site "slimy" and intended to stifle opposition.

"What they're trying to do is exclude from public debate opinions that go against the neo-conservative consensus that dominates discussion of policy on Iraq or policy on the Israeli conflict by smearing us and calling us aliens," he said.

Pipes said he will not remove a "Keep Us Informed" page on the site that opponents say is an attempt to get students to turn in their professors. He said it gives students a place to complain about mistreatment.

"What you have in university is exclusion of alternate points of view," Pipes said. "You've got to subscribe to the party line and then you can make your career. If you don't, you're out."

The Week in Israel

Sept. 23

• An Israeli was killed and three children wounded when a Palestinian opened fire on a group from Jerusalem who had come to visit the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

Sept. 24

• Nine Palestinians were killed in gun battles that erupted after Israeli forces seeking weapons factories, entered Gaza. The army destroyed 13 workshops where rocket components were being assembled.

Sept. 25

• The military wing of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement threatened a group of Palestinian officials who have been attempting to appoint a prime minster to share power with Arafat. "[A] group of collaborators, in co-ordination with Israel and the U.S., seeks to create an alternative leadership," the Al Aqsa Brigades said in a leaflet that singled out Nabil Abu Amr, who has been openly critical of Arafat.

• Capt. Harel Mermelstein, 23, was killed near Tulkarm while leading his unit in search of terror suspects.

• Using Apache helicopters, the army attacked a car in Gaza carrying Hamas military leader Mohammed Deif. It was not clear if Deif, Israel's most-wanted terror suspect, was killed by the strike. Two of his aides, however, were known to have died in the attack. (Intelligence reports the following day suggested Deif had been wounded but not killed.)

Sept. 27

• Thousands of mourners attended the funeral of Rabbi Zerach Warhaftig, one of the founders of the National Religious Party and a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Warhaftig, 96, died the previous day in Jerusalem.

Iraq crisis moves closer to war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The growing crisis over Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction is moving inexorably toward war.

The United States and Britain, having lost faith in the United Nations' arms inspection system, no longer think Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein can be contained and deterred. Washington has abandoned its "smart sanctions" policy and now believes Iraq can be fully disarmed only through a regime change

Since the departure of UN weapons inspectors from Iraq in 1998, Iraq has had ample time to conceal its cache of chemical, biological and, possibly, nuclear weapons.

Last week, British Prime Minister Tony Blair released an intelligence report claiming Iraq is producing chemical and biological agents, drawing up plans to deploy them, attempting to acquire the materiel to manufacture atomic bombs, and developing long-range ballistic missiles.

On Sept. 16, Iraq, stung by the United States' iron resolve to settle the matter by military force, announced its willingness to comply with UN resolutions, some 16 at last count, and permit inspectors to return "without conditions." But the Bush administration denigrated the offer as disengenuous.

Arms inspectors began their work in Iraq in 1992, a year after the Gulf War. Although they managed to destroy much of Iraq's non-conventional arsenal, they ran into Iraqi obstructionist tactics designed to thwart their mission.

Washington is of the view that Iraq, its promises of free and unfettered access notwithstanding, would revert to the same cat-and-mouse games should the inspectors return.

In a letter to the UN on Sept. 19, Saddam claimed that Iraq is "clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons." Typically, he blamed the United States for fabricating the crisis to promote the interests of Zionism and Israel, which he described as "the Zionist entity."

On Sept. 21, Iraq exacerbated the looming confrontation by rejecting the idea of a new UN resolution being proposed by the United States and Britain. It would threaten Iraq with military force if it does not allow truly unconditional inspections.

France and Russia, permanent members of the UN Security Council, prefer a motion that would first require Iraq's full co-operation with the inspection teams. France and Russia maintain that the crisis can be resolved through peaceful means. Canada has let it be known that a military assault should be conducted through UN auspices.

But the United States, having enunciated a post Sept. 11 strategic doctrine of preemptive action against hostile states and terrorist groups, will probably bypass the UN and act unilaterally. Last month, President George W. Bush asked Congress for sweeping authority to use "all means," including military force, to disarm Iraq.

Prior to that, Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney laid out the case for attacking Iraq and unseating Saddam.

Arab states, principally Saudi Arabia to Egypt, fear that a war would destabilize their own authoritarian regimes and encourage a new round of international terrorism, a point alluded to last week by U.S. presidential aspirant Al Gore.

In a bid to soften up Iraq's defences, the United States has been bombing fixed Iraqi air defence sites in northern and southern no-fly zones in Iraq and mobilizing its forces in the Middle East.

Washington has about 20,000 troops and an armada of aircraft and armoured equipment in the region. Tens of thousands of additional troops will be flown in once Bush makes a firm decision to strike Iraq. An offensive may begin as early as December or as late as February.

In the meantime, Bush is urging Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to desist from retaliation should Iraq attack Israel. Baghdad has warned Israel there will be severe consequences if it hits Iraq.

Mindful of an anti-American backlash in the Arab world in the event of a U.S. military campaign in Iraq, the United States has advised Israel to end its siege of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's battered compound in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

What You Should Know

A New Permanent Resident Card: A more secure and durable proof of residency card for permanent residents (landed immigrants) living in Canada is one feature of Canada's new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act. This tamper-resistant card replaces the paper document (IMM 1000) for travel purposes.

Who will need the new Permanent Resident Card: "Permanent residents" are people who have applied and been accepted to live in Canada. Permanent residents travelling outside of Canada as of December 31, 2003 will need this card to re-enter Canada. Canadian citizens do not need a Permanent Resident Card, and will not be issued this Card.

Becoming Canadian: Permanent residents who can become Canadian citizens are encouraged to apply for their citizenship.

When To Apply For Your Permanent Resident Card: Applications are now available. They will be processed based on the year you became a permanent resident of Canada. Check the chart below to see in which month you should apply. For example, if your year of landing as a permanent resident was 1998, you should submit your application in May 2003. There is no need to apply earlier.

Anti-Semitic campaign tactics may have hurt German opposition

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Jewish leaders are celebrating the results of Germany's national elections as a sign that anti-Semitic campaign tactics do not pay.

As the results from last Sunday's election came in, one politician, Jurgen Mollemann, apparently paid for such tactics with his job when he resigned as vice-president of the Free Democratic Party (FDP).

Mollemann, who long has expressed sympathy for Palestinian suicide bombers, roiled Germany earlier this year when he said during the campaign that Michel Friedman, a vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, helped provoke anti-Semitism by his manner and behaviour.

Though xenophobia and right-wing populism are rising in other parts of Europe, Mollemann's party was hurt by his statements, which many saw as anti-Semitic. His party's poor showing cost the opposition Christian Social Union/Christian Democratic Union a chance to build a governing coalition.

Instead, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's Social Democratic Party will remain in power with its partner of four years, the Green Party.

The election was described as the closest in Germany's postwar history.

"The most important result is that if you bring anti-Semitic ideas into an election campaign in this country, the people don't accept it," Friedman said in an interview.

Earlier this year, Friedman called Mollemann's anti-Israel statements one-sided and anti-Semitic.

Paul Spiegel, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said last week he is pleased with Mollemann's resignation.

He was "thankful that the attempt to win with anti-Semitic slogans has failed," Spiegel said in a statement. "The voters showed clearly that German democracy is healthy."

Mollemann was not the only German politician to step down after the election results came in. Schroeder said Justice Minister Herta Daeubler-Gmelin announced she would not seek another term in the post.

In the week before the vote, Daeubler-Gmelin was reported to have said that U.S. President George W. Bush's sabre-rattling on Iraq was similar to what Hitler had done to divert attention from domestic issues.

She later denied having made the comment.

Molleman's attacks on Israel and Friedman continued into the campaign's final days, despite attempts by FDP leader Guido Westerwelle's to silence him.

In the tumultuous post-election hours, when it was clear the FDP had destroyed the opposition's chances of unseating Schroeder, Mollemann resigned his vice-presidential post. But he said he would not give up his role as head of the party in his home state, North-Rhine Westphalia, where the FDP managed to beat the Greens.

Friedman said he is "relieved" by Mollemann's resignation.

"But I don't believe this is solving the real problem, which is that 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the German population holds anti-Semitic beliefs," he said. "We had an election campaign that was anti-Semitic, anti-Zionist and anti-American."

He added that there should now be a public debate in Germany about such issues, "because we are speaking about the foundations of German democracy."

The Greens became the tie breaker in the election, which left the Social Democrats and CSU/CDU with exactly 38.5 per cent of the vote each.

The Greens barely beat the FDP, 8.6 per cent to 7.4 per cent. The reconstituted communist party, the Party of Democratic Socialism, ended up with 4 per cent of the vote nationwide.

Other parties from the far left to the far right pulled in less than 3 per cent combined.

Some warn that the post-election teeth-gnashing over anti-Semitism could have negative consequences.

"There is a danger when Jewish topics are considered to be the pivotal factor in an election in a country with less than 100,000 Jews," said Deidre Berger, director of the American Jewish Committee's office in Berlin.

While "there was a lot of discomfort with comments made by Jurgen Mollemann," she said, "I still think the party should look elsewhere" to explain its failure.

Berger said it was "certainly of significance for the Jewish community" that the Greens' leader, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, will probably remain in office under a continued coalition between the Social Democrats and the Greens.

"He has shown a remarkable commitment to Israel and the Jewish people," she said.

At the same time, she added, "the incremental shift in Germany's policy toward Israel has less to do with specific parties than with a younger generation coming to power."

Friedman, who is a member of the Christian Democrats, pointed out that the Greens "were 100 per cent kosher in the debate" about anti-Semitism during the campaign.

In fact, Fischer was one of the first political leaders to condemn Mollemann's campaign tactics as anti-Semitic.

Friedman decided not to respond to the most recent of Mollemann's attacks, which included a flier in the final campaign week criticizing Friedman and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"It was a very tough time in the second period of the campaign not to say anything, but I wanted to show that" Mollemann's tactic "is not dependent on my reactions," Friedman said. "I was only the symbol for the Jewish community itself."

Shekel dives; IMF report brings more bad news

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The International Monetary Fund (IMF) said last week that Israel faces negative growth and rising unemployment this year, a statement that capped a day of economic gloom in which fears that the country's credit rating would be downgraded had sent the shekel plunging against the dollar.

The IMF report predicted that Israel's gross domestic product would contract by 1.5 per cent this year, but would rebound and grow by 1.8 per cent in 2003. But it did not foresee this growth helping unemployment, which it said would hit 10.7 per cent this year and 10.9 per cent next year. It also forecast an inflation rate of 6.2 per cent this year and 3.0 per cent in 2003.

The report, which surveyed most of the world's nations, predicted negative growth this year for only two other developed economies – Japan and Iceland.

The IMF's pessimistic predictions are matched by those being made by most Israeli analysts. The Finance Ministry expects GDP to fall by 1.0 per cent this year and to grow by 1.0 per cent next year.

The IMF report noted that the worldwide recovery that began at the end of 2001 began to stall in the second quarter of 2002, and predicted that this slowdown would continue through 2003.

It therefore predicted that average growth worldwide would be only 2.8 per cent this year, down from its earlier forecast of 4.0 per cent. In developed economies, growth will average a mere 1.7 per cent this year, it said, while unemployment will average 6.4 per cent and inflation will average 1.4 per cent.

New foundation raises funds for cancer cure

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Jennifer Coristine felt helpless after her sister Lisa was diagnosed with a brain tumour last summer. But she was determined to find a way to help Lisa by doing something that would have a lasting impact. Lisa, a vibrant 27-year-old, has always led an impeccably healthy lifestyle and the diagnosis sent her family reeling.

During a heart-to-heart talk Jennifer had with Jackie Taitz, Lisa's best friend, she learned of a Jewish spiritual healer's philosophy for helping a person in need. It encourages people to pray, make sacrifices and act charitably.

"We agreed to do all three," said Jennifer, "For doing something charitable, we decided to form a foundation."

Jennifer, Jackie and Amir Sperling, Lisa's boyfriend went on to establish Brave Heart Foundation for a Cure, which will be launched with a five-kilometre walk-a-thon on Sunday, Oct. 6, with Lisa leading the walk. Jennifer said the event's aim is to raise $10,000.

The funds raised by the foundation will go to the targeted radiation therapy program at Princess Margaret Hospital, where Lisa receives treatment. Targeted radiation is a more precise way of attacking cancer cells and helps minimize damage to healthy cells, greatly reducing the chance of side effects.

Jennifer said the goal of the foundation, which is being administered by Princess Margaret Hospital, is to raise funds for better and more accurate methods of targeted radiation, which enhances a cancer patient's chances of successful treatment.

"I don't want anyone else to go through what my family has gone through in the past year and I don't want my family to have to go through it," said Jennifer.

Although in its infancy, the response to the foundation has been tremendous and Jennifer said she's received several e-mails from people inquiring about the walk-a-thon.

"I think this case has really hit home for people," she said, adding that people tend to think they won't get cancer if they don't smoke or if they exercise regularly. "This has shown people that what happened to Lisa can happen to anyone at any time."

After having been misdiagnosed for more than a year, Lisa, a Thornhill resident, learned that she had an eight-centimetre tumour in her sinuses, which was pressing against her brain. Both the location of the tumour and its occurrence in someone as young as Lisa are rare, according to her oncologist.

After undergoing surgery in August 2001 to remove the tumour, an MRI in June revealed that tumours had grown in the outer membrane of Lisa's brain. She completed a series of radiation treatments in September.

Lisa is now in a state of uncertainty, since there are many potential side effects that may appear over the next several months. She may experience problems with her eyesight, her hair may never grow back and she may have hormonal problems.

Lisa said her condition has made her think in "black and white" terms.

"What has kept me going is thinking 'Do I want to live or do I want to die?' I had to bring it down to its basest level," she said.

She also emphasized the importance of having faith and engaging in self-reflection.

"Judaism tells us that when you're faced with a crisis, you're meant to look inside yourself," Lisa said. "You look at what changes you can make. I've looked inward and recognized my own strengths."

Lisa said the support she has received from friends and family has been crucial, and she praises the excellent care at Princess Margaret Hospital.

"It makes me feel good that I can give back to the hospital with the foundation," Lisa said. "I feel like the walk-a-thon is the first of many steps for me to use my experience for the greater good."

The walk begins at 10 a.m. on Oct. 6 at Leslie Street and Steeles Avenue. Participants will receive one point for every dollar raised, which can be used to buy prizes at iloverewards.ca. The participant who raises the most money will win a DVD player.

For more information, please contact Brave_Heart_Foundation@hotmail.com. To donate to the Brave Heart Foundation, make cheques payable to the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My three-year-old eats much better when I feed her and she really likes me to. Is this okay sometimes?

A. No. Unless there is a physical reason why your daughter cannot feed herself, she should be eating independently at three years old. Give her appropriate utensils, cut her food up well and let her feed herself.

Kids will become very lazy about eating and feeding if they know that mom or dad will willingly feed them. Encourage her independence; she can do it. You may have a few days where she eats less, but if you stick to your guns and tell her that she is a big girl and can do it herself, she eventually will.

Q. What is the healthiest all purpose cooking oil to use?

A. Canola. It has the least saturated fat and is high in heart-healthy fat too. Olive oil is next best; it has slightly more saturated fat but also more monounsatured fat (good fat). Olive oil definitely has more flavour so it is a good choice for recipes requiring that flavour.

Q. Are white bagels are better to eat when you are dieting than whole wheat because they are lower in calories?

A. No. White bagels are a bad choice for a dieter. First, the average bagel (white or whole wheat) contains the same calories as four slices of bread. The whole wheat bagel will at least fill you up more and keep you feeling fuller longer. Your best choice is one or two slices of rye, whole wheat or pumpernickel bread.

Book tells story of Jewish boy in a lumber camp

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

If there is one place that you don't expect to find a little Jewish boy, it's a lumber camp. But that's where Marven, a little boy from Duluth, Minn., wound up, in Kathryn Lasky's wonderful book Marven of the Great North Woods, Harcourt Voyager, 2002, originally published 1997.

The story is set in 1918, at the time of a terrible epidemic, all over the world, an epidemic of influenza, what we call flu.

Now, these days, the flu usually is not a very serious thing. We have a kind of drugs called antibiotics, which can cure most infections. But they were developed nearly 20 years after the events of this book. Until then, if you got the flu, or any other infectious disease, you could get very sick indeed. In fact, you could even die.

During the 1918 flu, thousands of people did die, and families were very frightened.

When Marven's aunt died from this disease, his family decided that they had to save Marven. As his mother said, "I want him to live to be a man."

Marven, as you can imagine, was pretty nervous. In the first place, most of the people who worked in the logging camp were French Canadian, and spoke French. Marven could only speak English. Besides, he was only 10.

But most of all, he knew that he would miss his parents, his sisters and the rest of the family. Also, he would worry about them getting sick.

His mother made him a warm coat, and a hat lined with beaver fur and with earflaps. His father gave him skis, which he had made for him when he turned six. His mother also gave him hot latkes and knishes for him to eat and to keep him warm on the trip.

After a long, long train trip, Marven found himself alone on a platform, facing "a road [that] looked like it went on forever." He had to ski five miles until he found Mr. Murray, from the logging camp.

Marven was given a little room of his own, and a job to do – the payroll. He also had another duty – to wake up the lumberjacks who slept through the wake-up bells.

At first, everything seemed very strange – the cold, the job, the people, the language. But gradually, he learned some French and got to be friends with the lumberjacks. He even learned the lumberjacks' French songs and dances.

There was one problem. Well, actually two. First, there was the problem that the food wasn't kosher. Second, he missed his family very much and hoped that they had not gotten sick.

You might wonder why the family sent Marven away, but not his sisters. In those days, girls simply didn't leave the family home – it was not considered proper or safe for them.

The illustrations by Kevin Hawkes are excellent – rich colours of reds, blues and yellows, set against vast expanses of white.

Marven of the Great North Woods won the Jewish Book Council's National Jewish Book Award, which it richly deserved.

buried treasure

Itzik the Blacksmith walked over the ancient Charles Bridge of Prague. Carefully, he climbed down the worn stone steps to the riverbank. There, near the apple tree. That's where he knew the treasure was. Excitedly, he began digging in the muddy earth. There! His shovel hit something hard. He dug more, revealing the wooden box. The wood was rotted and the metal clasp broke as he lifted the lid.

There shone emeralds, rubies, sapphires, gold!

With wonder and joy, Itzik, woke up. He sighed.

"Again, Itzik?" his wife Sarale groggily asked.

"This is the third time I've had this dream," Itzik declared. "It must be true. I will go to Prague and bring back that treasure! I'll..."

"Can't you wait until morning?" Sarale sleepily mumbled.

"All right," Itzik grudgingly agreed.

Early next morning, Itzik set off for Prague. His wife had prepared food for his journey, which he had in a sack slung over his back, along with a blanket. In his hand, he carried his sturdy shovel....

It was a long journey, but Itzik walked quickly, enthusiastically. The treasure was waiting for him. He walked through fields, passing occasional farmhouses. His path led him through a dense forest. Most of the leaves had already fallen off the trees, crunching under his feet, but a few still tenaciously clung to their branches. It was getting colder. The sun was beginning to set. He wrapped himself tightly in his blanket, and went to sleep on top of the dry, fallen leaves.

Itzik continued walking the next day, and the next. Finally, he arrived in Prague. He pushed through the throngs of peddlers hawking their wares. Then ahead of him, he saw the Bridge. Unable to control himself any longer, he began running. He reached the worn stone steps leading to the riverbank and carefully climbed down. There, near the apple tree. That's where he knew the treasure was. Excitedly, he began digging in the muddy earth. And digging. And digging. He found nothing. Maybe this wasn't the place. Maybe he should dig here. Or here. The day wore on and he filled the ground with holes, but found nothing.

"All right, what are you doing?" Itzik jumped, and turned around. The uniformed guard loomed over him. "Are you trying to dig up the bridge?" the guard demanded.

"No... no... it's just that I had a...dream...that there was a treasure buried here."

"A dream?" demanded the guard. "You believe in dreams? Why, I had I a dream the other night that there's a fortune hidden under the oven of Itzik the Blacksmith in Bratislava, and do you think I'm going all the way to Bratislava to look for it? Don't you know dreams are meaningless? But if you insist on digging for treasure, I won't stop you."

"No, no, I'm done digging, it's just that...you wouldn't understand. But thank you."

Itzik hurried up the stone steps, and crossed the bridge, leaving the puzzled guard staring after him. He journeyed though forests, through fields, until...

"Itzik! Did you find the treasure?"

"No, but..."

"Itzik! What are you doing to our oven? Put down that axe!" Sarale dashed forward, but she was too late to stop her husband.

The oven shattered and the fragments skittered across the floor. Beneath the broken shards of their oven shone emeralds, rubies, sapphires, gold!

HOLY BLOSSOM CONCERT CELEBRATES MUSIC OF SRUL IRVING GLICK

Lydia Adams and the Amadeus Choir pay homage to the late composer Srul Irving Glick in A Celebration of Life, an upcoming concert of Glick compositions with special guests Lachan (Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir), the Holy Blossom Temple Singers conducted by Cantor Ben Maissner, and the Beth Tikvah Choir conducted by Marilyn Cohen.

Glick's music "combines elements of Hebraic lyricism and classical composition techniques in an original and contemporary style that is dramatic, melodious and truly inspiring," according to a press release.

Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. General admission $30; students and seniors $25. Sunday, Oct. 6, 7:30 p.m. 416-446-0188, www.amadeuschoir.com.

Remembering Slain Journalist: PEN Canada is co-producing a concert in Toronto memorializing journalist Daniel Pearl, the Wall Street Journal reporter who was kidnapped and murdered by terrorists in Pakistan earlier this year.

"Music was a particular passion of Daniel Pearl's and this concert is presented as part of an international Daniel Pearl Music Day," said Dr. Peter Simon, president of the Royal Conservatory of Music, where the concert is being held. "Like thousands of others around the world, I was moved by the eloquent response of his wife, family and friends. Rather than seek retribution, they have chosen to honour his love of humanity."

The program features Brahms, Mozart, Samuel Barber and Kaddish by Helen Greenberg. Performers include mezzo-soprano Ramona Carmelly, violinist Erika Raum, pianist Dianne Werner and the Veritas Piano Quartet. Proceeds to go to the Daniel Pearl Foundation.

Royal Conservatory of Music, Ettore Mazzoleni Hall, 273 Bloor St. W. Adults $25. Wednesday, Oct. 9, 8 p.m. 416-408-2824, ext. 321.

Jewish Folk Choir: Fresh from its two successful concerts at the Ashkenaz festival, the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir launches its new season under the baton of guest conductor Alexander Veprinsky, a skilled choral and orchestral musician who emigrated from Ukraine in 1993.

The choir's repertoire focuses on Yiddish song but also includes Hebrew-Israeli, classical works on Jewish themes, Judeo-Spanish, new Canadian compositions and international folk songs. All voices of those who read or follow music are welcome.

Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. (six blocks north of Bathurst and Lawrence, just east of Bathurst). Wednesday, Oct. 9, 7:25 p.m. Call Howard at 416-593-0750 or Jean at 416-489-7681.

Author probes moral dilemmas of death camp inmates

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Desperate times call for desperate measures. Nowhere else is this cliché more apt than in the Nazi concentration and death camps, where otherwise normal people did unimaginable things in order to live one more day.

Toronto author Vera Schiff, a Holocaust survivor, has written Hitler's Inferno, an anthology with eight accounts of concentration camp inmates, all friends or relatives of Schiff's, who were forced to do things we might find reprehensible in order to survive.

The eight people profiled in this book are very different. Before the war, some were doctors or lawyers, others housewives or socialites, while some were merely students.

They all had to cope with unimaginable horror in their own unique way. From the moment they stepped off the cattle cars at Auschwitz and tried to make sense of the chaotic hell around them, they were forced to keenly hone their sense of survival.

We can sympathize with some of the people in this book, like George the doctor, who was assigned to perform autopsies at Theresienstadt. Transferred to Dachau, he survived until liberation, but died when, not knowing better, a sympathetic American soldier fed him his rations and a tin of ham. The shock to George's system was too much for his body to take.

But some of the other people profiled by Schiff may outrage readers. Rita, for example, a young woman from a wealthy Viennese family, became the mistress of a notorious concentration camp commander. She was exempted from backbreaking labour and was never lacking basic necessities.

Fred, a young Czech, decided to make a deal with the devil by becoming an informer to the barrack's kapo – an inmate chosen by the Nazis to supervise and brutalize other inmates. For this, Fred got a slightly larger piece of bread each day.

But by far the most controversial figure in Hitler's Inferno is Marianne (Nan). A young "cool, calculating and self-centred girl, totally wrapped up in herself."

At Auschwitz, Schiff writes, "she was smart and cunning. All her senses on high alert, she grasped that it would call on all her smarts to dodge the angel of death in this most efficient homicidal factory."

Early on in her incarceration, "she made up her mind to pursue her exploration persistently, until she reached her goal."

Her goal: to become kapo.

Usually, people chosen to be kapos were violent criminals before the war, and they were rarely Jewish. But Nan got her wish by becoming intimate with Franz, one of the kapos. At her request, he pulled some strings and she became a kapo herself. If Nan's story ended this way, the reader might actually sympathize with her.

But unfortunately Nan made a great kapo. "Before long, she became infamous for savagery... she accepted the fact that she was a sadist... few recovered from her vicious beatings."

Nan survived the Holocaust and went on to live in Israel, where she died of cancer. Towards the end of her illness, she came to believe it was her penalty for her wartime behaviour.

Schiff's inclusion of Nan in the anthology is bound to be controversial. Camp inmates despised kapos, and Nan survived by brutalizing other Jews.

Schiff's argument is that every inmate was forced to do things that go against human nature in order to survive.

"Those were brutal times," Schiff said in an interview. "Lots of people don't understand how life unfolded in the camps and what it took to survive. Nan's story is the truth. Not to report the truth would be a travesty of justice."

She doesn't explicitly defend Nan's actions – but of the book's eight characters, Schiff gives the most detail about Nan's background, describing the sordid, dysfunctional family life she had as a child almost as a lawyer might use a client's past as a defence.

Schiff's use of her subjects' personal histories is the book's strength. She uses a non-academic approach and breathes life into characters she obviously knows very well.

As well, her description of everyday life in the camps illustrates the reality of this existence far better than an academic history. She does for the Holocaust what Dostoyevsky did for Siberian prison camps in House of the Dead.

Hitler's Inferno is published by Raj Publishing and available at most book stores. Schiff's first book, Theresienstadt: The Town The Nazis Gave To The Jews won the Eli Wiesel Writing Award in 1998.

A blend of China and Portugal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MACAO — This former Portuguese colony, the first European enclave in Asia, is an intriguing blend of cultures.

Portugal seized Macao in the mid-16th century and transformed it into a great east-west trading post. Then, in 1999, Portugal ceded Macao to China.

Like neighbouring Hong Kong, Macao is a Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China. Lying 65 kilometres west of Hong Kong on the western bank of the Pearl River delta, Macao strikes a first-time visitor as a happy hybrid, a seamless mixture of China and Portugal in terms of its architecture, bilingual street signs and Macanese cuisine.

In 1513, Jorge Alvares was the first Portuguese explorer to set foot on Chinese soil. His arrival is commemorated by a statue in Macao's main square.

Portuguese settlers established a permanent outpost 40 years later, and Macao became a key intermediary in the commercial links between China and Japan on the one hand, and Asia and Europe on the other.

Macao's mercantile importance declined after Britain colonized Hong Kong in 1842. By the beginning of the 20th century, Macao was a sleepy backwater.

Four centuries of Portuguese influence left a deep imprint in Macao, whose current population is 450,000. Of these, 150,000 hold Portuguese passports. Some are Eurasian.

Macao's Mediterranean ambience is unique in China and is evident everywhere, from its cobblestone streets and baroque churches to its massive fortresses and street names emblazoned on Portuguese blue enamel tiles.

The historic core of Macao, which is paved with black and white small stones suggesting ocean waves, is Senado Square, or Largo do Senado.

Macao is a fusion of east and west

The square is crowned by two unmistakable and beautiful Mediterranean buildings: St. Dominic's church with its yellow columns, hunter green shutters and white filigree work, and Santa Casa de Misericordia (the Holy House of Mercy), a blindingly white structure where orphans found refuge in the 18th century.

It is to the west of Largo do Senado, which is on Avenida Almeida Ribeiro. It's a busy thoroughfare of yellow and pale green Chinese-style buildings and brightly-lit jewelry shops.

The Church of St. Lawrence (Sao Paulo) is Macao's trademark. What still stands is a facade, the remains of an early 17th century church constructed by the Jesuits. From here, Jesuit priests spread Christianity throughout Asia until their expulsion in 1762.

The Monte fort, the seat of government until 1749 and now a ruin, was built by the Jesuits from 1617 to 1626 to defend Macao from invaders.

Largo do Senado, the historic core of Macao.

The cannons on its roof, some of which face the mainland Chinese city of Zhuhai across the muddy river, were used only once, in 1622, to repel a bungled Dutch incursion.

Macao's excellent historical museum opened in 1998. It showcases Portugal's relationship with Macao, and is cleverly incorporated into the structure of the fort.

Accessible by escalator, the museum is on three floors, and is a mix of thoughtful exhibits and holograms. Visitors enter the museum through the impressive facade of a yellow and white classical Portuguese dwelling.

Among Macao's other forts are Mong-Ha, which was in active service until about 40 years ago and is now the site of a hotel and tourism training school, and Guia, which is dominated by the oldest lighthouse on China's coast, offering the best panoramic views of Macao.

Being a free port, Macao is a shoppers' paradise. It is known for its antique furniture (authentic or faux), Chinese prints on rice or silk paper, decorative and jewelled boxes, curios, glassware, porcelain and jewelry (particularly gold, jade and pearls).

Rua de Sao Paulo, adjacent to St. Lawrence church, is an ideal place to buy antiques and prints.

Two of the shops that can be recommended are Mobelias Mei Chai and Min Chai. But beware: fair prices are the end result of back-and-forth bargaining.

Unlike Hong Kong, Macao caters to the whims and compulsions of gamblers. Its 10 casinos, from the four-storey Hotel Lisboa on down, brim with a glittering array of slot machines (locals refer to them as "hungry tigers") and offer card games from blackjack and fan-tan to baccarat and boule.

Several of the casinos are on the island of Taipa, connected to Mauca by two bridges. Like Taipa, the island of Coloane forms Macao's rural, mostly unspoiled hinterland.

Both islands are forested and contain nature trails, picnic areas, beaches and ancestral Chinese villages.

The outdoor markets of Macao bristle with fruit and vegetable vendors and fish mongers. They are certainly worth visiting, and the mingled aromas are unforgettable.

No visit to Macao would be complete without a stop at a traditional Chinese tea house.

The Casada Cha-Long Wa is an appealing place, all the more so because Chinese men bring their caged birds here to "socialize."

The birds, some in cages draped with white sheets, sing up a cacophonous storm as their owners sip tea from small cups, seemingly oblivious to the din.

The food in Macao runs the gamut from Portuguese vegetable soups (Caldo verde) to Chinese fried noodles (Tchau min). The delectable fare is a heady fusion of east and west – like Macao itself.

Top klezmer act to play Hummingbird Centre

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

The recent Ashkenaz Festival at Harbourfront gave Toronto a hearty dose of klezmer and Yiddish music, sure to satisfy all appetites for Yiddishkeit.

No need to feel withdrawal symptoms, however, as Toronto will soon play host to another world-class klezmer event.

The Klezmer Conservatory Band (KCB) will make its first Toronto appearance in three years Oct. 17 at the Hummingbird Centre. The KCB has been one of the leading groups in the field since the inception of the klezmer revival more than two decades ago. They are currently the longest-running klezmer act, now entering their 23rd year and showing no signs of fatigue.

The KCB was formed by Hankus Netsky in 1979 at the New England Conservatory of Music (NECM) in Boston. Netsky, a music professor at NECM and a descendant of a long line of klezmorim from the Philadelphia area, was one of the earliest trailblazers in the klezmer revival. His founding of the KCB was a seminal event in klezmer history.

The Klezmer Conservatory Band

The KCB has been committed from the beginning to a broad repertoire, encompassing American klezmer styles, Yiddish folk music, Yiddish theatre music and more. Its big-band approach, modelled on the classic American klezmer ensembles of the 1920s, has been its hallmark.

As the klezmer revival has progressed and fragmented into all sorts of spin-off genres, the KCB's commitment to its repertoire has remained.

"We play classic music. It's about the music rather than the individuals. There's a certain kind of anonymity in the group. It's a repertory group and we serve the music itself; that's what a good repertory group does," Netsky said in a recent phone interview.

He is quick to point out, however, that the high level of musicianship within the band allows the individuals to shine within their broader context.

The KCB has served as the breeding ground for many of the leading players in the klezmer scene. Tenure in the KCB was a first step toward the development of successful solo careers and offshoot projects for artists Frank London (Klezmatics), Ilene Stahl (Klezperanto), David Harris (Naftule's Dream), and Jeff Warschauer, to name only a few.

"It's very gratifying to be the music director of a group that has spawned so many talents," says Netsky. "My main role with this music has always been as a teacher. So when I see other people find their own direction with the music I take it as a compliment."

So how does a group like KCB with a sound based in "classic" repertoire stay fresh? Netsky chuckles at the question, appearing to have heard it before.

"We've never gotten sick of the music we play, and we're always developing new repertoire. We have an amazing range of instrumental colours to draw upon, and the material itself ranges vastly. We try to mix new and old, and appeal to many different kinds of audiences. We also involve ourselves in challenging new projects."

An example he cited is the "orchestra project" that KCB is embarking upon. Netsky has orchestrated nine tunes from the band's repertoire to be performed with symphony orchestras, the first with the Atlanta Symphony next spring.

Netsky is excited by the project because "it gives me a chance to expand the palette and tone colour of the band."

"There really is a rich history of Jewish symphonic music," he says, citing classical composers like Ernest Bloch, and referring to the big bands of klezmer icons Abe Ellstein and Alexander Olshanetsky as "little symphonies."

Netsky himself continues to research American Jewish music and is working toward a PhD in ethnomusicology from Wesleyan University.

With plans to record a new KCB CD next summer, he explains how his research will inform the next record.

"I see my own work as the continuation of an ongoing family tradition, and uncovering this aspect of my family's history over the years has deeply influenced my musical evolution. This is probably most evident in terms of the Philadelphia-style klezmer music that my family was a big part of and which has now become a bigger part of my own music."

A new Thrill of a Lifetime

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The CBC brought back Pierre Trudeau, CTV revisited Degrassi and the W Network (known as the Women's Network) is now reviving another piece of our television mosaic: the classic wish-fulfillment show Thrill of a Lifetime.

As production consultant for the show, veteran director Sidney M. Cohen says TV tastes may have changed but the basic desires remain the same. Whether someone wants to reunite with an estranged sister or climb the Andes, the challenges spark impressive TV drama.

When the wish-fulfillment show airs in the fall, Cohen says each of the 13 episodes will have "stories people will care about."

The 1981 version of Thrill of a Lifetime, which aired on CTV for seven years, also had Cohen at the helm as he ran the ship with his company Super People Productions. The shows centre around a couple "thrillees" with an extraordinary wish to fulfill. By the end of the episode, each person is filmed partaking in his/her thrill, and their lives are meshed with slick documentary production.

But don't compare this to Survivor. "This is more about the thrill, and exploring the reality of that dream," says Cohen, 54.

Possible segments could include a novice comic performing at a comedy club, or a woman finally meeting singer Barry Manilow after missing a chance to see him at a concert years ago. While most of the thrillees will be women, Cohen stresses the importance of the male role.

"Men are on the periphery because they're writing in thrills for their wives or sisters or daughters. Men are giving the thrills to their loved ones."

Cohen is thrilling his own female treasure, 23-year-old daughter Tracy. By pitching the show idea with his daughter to the production company, he says passing the mantle has been an exciting experience. He may have 10,000 program episodes under his belt, from Canada AM to the 1992 Summer Olympics, but Cohen is selfless enough to integrate his daughter into his business.

"She loves television and brings that energy into work," he says, adding his son Jay is working on a cruise-ship show on Prime called Porthole TV.

Cohen likes to keep it in the family, in order to feed the fires of life. "[My family] keeps me on my toes, it's the best way."

Starting as producer/director for CJOH-TV in Ottawa in 1968, Cohen leapt into the TV business with the passion to create enjoyable programming. Thirty-four years later, his credits look like a nostalgic TV guide: the game show Mad Dash, Canadian Living TV, On the Arts and Reach for the Top.

What made Cohen successful through the decades were not several strokes of luck or several hundred contacts. As Cohen believed in the '70s, television must serve the viewer first.

"The structure of media has changed," he says, "and the production method has changed. But our need to tell a good story hasn't changed, and that is what people want. Always."

Lithuanian emigré runs high-tech testing lab

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Jewish lore, Lithuania's yeshivot were known for their analytical, intellectual approach to religious issues – a marked contrast to the more emotional tack taken in other parts of Europe. Rabbinical schools in Vilna (Vilnius) were so admired for their scholarly excellence, the city became known as Yerushalayim de Lita (the Jerusalem of Lithuania).

Although he hasn't lived in Vilnius for 30 years, Jacob Kleiman is proud to recount his city's intellectual credentials and the Jewish community's cultural independence.

Under Communist control, the city's Jews maintained a tradition of study and accomplishment, but they focused their efforts on the areas that were open to them. As part of that rigorous, intellectual tradition, Kleiman studied at the city's polytechnical institute and earned a master's degree in technology with a specialty in electrical and radio devices.

Today he heads his own testing lab in Markham, Ont., just north of Toronto, where a small group of highly trained technicians – including a smattering of Soviet emigrés – evaluates materials for a variety of clients, most notably NASA.

Founded by Kleiman in 1989, Integrity Testing Laboratory (ITL) employs a dozen PhD scientists and engineers who investigate protective materials and coatings for space and aerospace applications, as well as trouble-shoot for clients in the chemical, metallurgical, wood, plastics and rubber industries.

In layman's terms – the level of jargon in the industry is formidable – ITL examines materials that have failed or have not met specifications. The subject of its investigations might simply be an aluminum ladder that did not live up to its expected lifespan, a metal tap that ruptured or an integrated circuit chip that corroded.

As Kleiman explains, "We are involved in anything to do with the material sciences."

One half to 60 per cent of the company's time is devoted to materials testing. But increasingly, ITL is focusing its attention on research and development projects in the aerospace and space fields, as well as the automotive and electronics industries.

Some of ITL's experiments have flown on space shuttle missions. Working with the Glen Lewis Research Centre in Cleveland, ITL devised a test to determine how a protective material would react to the environment of space after one year of exposure.

That experiment, known as MISSE, is now flying in orbit, Kleiman said. The material being tested is slated for use in the Space Station Remote Manipulation System, the next generation "Canadarm" that will be used to manipulate objects in orbit.

As it turns out, the vacuum of space is not particularly hospitable to earth-made materials. Chemical and physical erosion does occur on spacecraft. ITL develops surface modification techniques to alter the surface of objects so they do not erode.

ITL has a second space project on the go, one it proposed to the European Space Agency. That project focuses on the software that will predict erosion of materials in space.

Based on its findings, ITL recommends a course of action to make the materials more durable. One modification technology alters an object's surface layers give it enhanced stability and resistance to the environmental challenges of space, Kleiman said.

Although some of ITL's clients might be out of this world, the company must rely on more down-to-earth practices if it wants to get their business. ITL responds to RFPs (requests for proposals) issued by contracting companies, it relies on its network of contacts in the industry, it drums up business at trade shows and it dabbles in advertising.

By international corporate standards, ITL is still a micro cap. Kleiman expects the recently concluded fiscal year to generate gross sales of about $800,000 for the privately held company. Two years, ago, annual revenue was only $600,000 and last year it was somewhere between $700,000 and $750,000.

The annual growth has taken some pressure off Kleiman, who sweated bullets in the early years to make the company viable. But debt remains high – close to this year's revenue numbers.

Trained in the sciences, Kleiman admits he was a business novice when he launched ITL.

His earlier background gave little indication that he was an entrepreneur in the making. Starting your own company was, of course, out of the question in Communist Lithuania, but perhaps he tapped into some of the country's entrepreneurial culture, which remained alive, if below the surface.

Soviet domination of Lithuania dated only to the 1940s, so Jews there "were quite independent thinking" and used to listen to the BBC and Kol Yisrael on shortwave radio, Kleiman said.

Moreover, many Jews, including Kleiman, retained a link to the Jewish people.

"Our family was quite Jewishly raised," he said. "We weren't religious, but on the holidays, we went to shul."

Kleiman also participated in a Jewish musical ensemble in Vilnius, which later developed into a folk theatre.

After leaving the Soviet Union with his parents in 1972, Kleiman lived in Israel for eight years, during which time he earned a master's degree in micro-electronic devices from the Technion in Haifa.

Quite a few Russians were his classmates in those years, he recalled.

In 1979, Kleiman enrolled in the University of Toronto to pursue a PhD at its Institute of Aerospace Studies. Once he completed the course, he was quickly recruited by 3M, the giant U.S. industrial concern.

Kleiman worked for the company as a senior researcher on semiconductor materials and blue light lasers (used for communication between satellites and submarines). After eight years, 3M closed its Toronto operation, and although he received a job offer from the company, it would have meant transferring to Minneapolis.

He turned down the offer, since he " did not want to start again with a third immigration."

He decided instead to open his own business. Taking out a $60,000 mortgage on his home, he purchased a large chunk of lab equipment from 3M that he planned to use in a commercial, testing application.

His lack of business training hurt him in those early years.

In the first six months, he earned only $1,500. "I wasn't a businessman, I was more of a scientist," he said, adding that around that time, he became an adjunct professor in aerospace studies at U of T, working on aerospace materials.

But the business eventually took off. Today, ITL is headquartered in a 7,500-square-foot facility, much of which is taken up by the kind of futuristic machinery that might have graced the set of a 1950s space movie.

Kleiman believes that after the early, lean years, the company has reached a critical mass and is now in something of a stabilization period. He recently hired a sales and marketing specialist to help the company develop a long-term expansion and marketing strategy.

His financial advisors tell him he should focus on the lucrative testing part of the business – its bread and butter – and scrap the time-consuming R & D stuff, "but I don't like that idea," he said.

"I agree with them that I should stabilize and increase the testing part," he said, but he refuses to give up on the more exciting space-related work.

Besides, he said, it's an important component of his company that makes it possible to retain high quality people.

"Our uniqueness, where we have a niche, is to combine regular testing services with the knowledge that we offer, all in an industrial environment. You can look at us as a mini-industrial institute. We can tackle any material problem people may have and help them to solve it."

240 EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

The CEO of one of Canada's largest freight forwarding companies is seeking an assistant who is young, enthusiastic and quick thinking to shadow his every move.

In this position the individual will be trained by the President, work hand in hand and report directly to him. To properly assist the President, the ideal candidate will have an excellent command of the English language and have great communication skills. They must be willing to work 60 hours a week as well as answer calls on their cell after business hours and on weekends. It is not necessary for the individual to have previous experience in the freight forwarding business yet they must be quick and eager to learn.

If you possess all of the qualities above and can perform effectively in a fast-paced environment email your resume to dylann@idirect.com - Pay is commensurate with responsibilities.

Reform Overnight Camp seeks a Director of Education & Conference Co-ordinator. Must possess a University degree & exper. working with children, adults & seniors. Requires frequent travel and on-site work most weekends, and full-time residence at camp during the summer months. Apply in confidence to CJN Box 4542.

Israeli soccer champion Haifa registers historic win

By HA'ARETZ SPORTS STAFF

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Three goals from Ayegbeni Yakoubu – each more spectacular than the one before – gave Israeli soccer champion Maccabi Haifa a shock win last week as manager Yitzhak Shum's charges won their first game in group F of the Champions League.

Haifa completely outplayed Greece's Olympiakos Piraeus – 6–2 winners over Bayer Leverkusen the week before – and the victory was rarely in doubt after Yakoubu scored his first.

The Nigerian forward's hat-trick silenced the majority of the fans in Nicosia's GSP stadium, where Haifa is playing its home matches because of a ban on international matches in Israel.

The 15,000 Greek Cypriots and Olympiakos fans who travelled from Athens were shocked, and the 5,000 Haifa fans delighted, as Yakoubu, who was suspended for Haifa's earlier 5-2 loss to Manchester United, opened the scoring in the 27th minute.

The Nigerian international stepped up to send goalkeeper Dimitrios Eleftheropoulos the wrong way after a dubious penalty was awarded when Italian referee Massimo De Santis ruled that Walid Badir was fouled in the penalty area. The call may have been harsh on Olympiakos, but it was no more than the team deserved and Yakoubu made no mistake on the penalty.

He added a second after one hour of playing time after powering his way into the area on the right, breaking free of a defender and slotting the ball under the advancing Olympiakos goalkeeper.

Olympiakos threw everything into attack to salvage something from the game, but in the 85th minute Yakoubu picked up a loose ball and he made no mistake to send the Israeli fans into rapture.

After the game, hat-trick hero Yakoubu said: "It was a tough game, more so because we weren't playing at home. I am delighted that I didn't leave Haifa at the end of last season, and that I am playing in the Champions League."

Shum said simply that his players "performed like lions. I am very proud."

At a news conference prior to the game, Shum acknowledged, "This is a hugely important game, against a team that cannot be underestimated. Unfortunately for us, this is to all intents and purposes a home game for Olympiakos, in a competition where home ground advantage can be vital.

"It is true that we did not manage to win or draw against Manchester United, but I am not going to change our game plan, which has got us this far. Even in the game against Sturm Graz, when we only needed a draw to progress, we played attacking, open soccer, and that's how we'll play tonight."

This is Olympiakos' fifth season in the Champions League, and so far, they have only ever lost a home game to Manchester United, a record any team in Europe would be proud of.

On the other hand, the Greeks are yet to win an away game; a record any team in Europe would be desperate to get rid of.

Confidence was high in the Olympiakos camp prior to the game, but coach Takis Lemonis said he was taking nothing for granted.

"We really enjoyed the Leverkusen game, but must not get carried away," he said. "If anything, our concentration has to be better. You cannot underestimate Maccabi simply because their players are not such big names."

Meanwhile, in other soccer action recently, Israel's two other representatives in European competition, Hapoel Tel Aviv and Maccabi Tel Aviv, both registered first-round, first-leg victories in the UEFA Cup.

By ASSAF BERGERFREUND and ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Israelis' celebrations of Maccabi Haifa's Champions Cup win over Olympiakos Piraeus turned to fear as 600 Maccabi fans were attacked by 1,500 Olympiakos supporters at the Larnaca airport last week while waiting to return to Israel.

The Greek fans, who were also waiting for a return flight home, broke through a thin line of police separating the two camps, beating the green-clad Haifa fans while some shouted "Adolf Hitler" and "Yasser Arafat."

Olympiakos Piraeus later apologized to Maccabi Haifa and its fans for the ugly incidents and condemned the violent behaviour of its fans. But it also made it clear that it blamed the Cypriot police for allowing the incident to happen at all.

The Greek team said that at a meeting before the game, police chiefs warned them such an incident was possible. "The police should have been prepared for this," a team spokesperson said. "Despite the disgraceful behaviour by a small gang of fans, we are certain that incident will not have any influence on the good relations between the two clubs."

The Haifa supporters were celebrating the team's historic win and singing soccer chants while waiting for their flights home. Some of the chants were for Olympiakos' bitter Athens rival, Panathinaikos.

Within moments, the Greek fans started throwing coins at the Israelis, who quickly stopped singing and moved to the far end of the departure lounge.

The hall then filled with several hundred more Olympiakos fans. The Greeks broke through the flimsy security cordon that divided the two sets of fans and began beating anyone in green they came across. Many of the Haifa followers, including a large number of children and teenagers, took cover behind the check-in counters.

Those who were too slow to take shelter were knocked to the ground and stripped of their green shirts and scarves. Several were kicked and punched.

Local police finally managed to regain control and prevented the Olympiakos fans from seriously injuring any Israelis. They were unable to prevent the Greeks from continuing to throw bottles, coins, ashtrays, chairs and anything that could be thrown at the Israelis.

"They had murder in their eyes," said one fan on arrival at Ben-Gurion airport. "They were chanting 'Adolf Hitler' and 'Yasser Arafat.'"

The official Larnaca police response to the incidents offered a somewhat different view of events. "There was some pushing and shoving and maybe the odd punch but nothing more than that. Riot police moved in swiftly to separate the troublemakers," a police spokesperson said.

Larnaca police chief Nicos Stelikos, in charge of security at the airport, said there were no arrests, no injuries and no damage to public property.

He dismissed suggestions by Maccabi fans that there was a lack of police protection for the Israelis.

ספרותנו

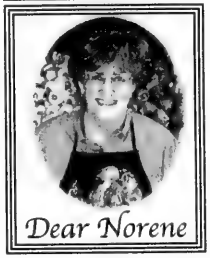
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

Barbara Lauterbach's book, Potato Salad, Fifty Favorite Recipes (Chronicle, $18.95 US) contains 50 luscious recipes plus terrific tips on making the perfect potato salad. Most recipes can be adapted easily for the kosher kitchen.

Potato salads work best with low- or medium-starch potatoes whose waxy texture allows them to hold together when diced and mixed. Here's how to test a potato's starch content: In a large bowl, make a brine solution of 1 cup salt and 11 cups water. Drop the potato in question into the solution. If it floats, it has a low starch content.

It is preferable not to peel potatoes before cooking for salad. They retain their shape better, will not become soggy, and more nutrients are retained.

Don't like raw onions in your potato salad? For a delicate onion flavor, boil 2 medium, peeled yellow onions, halved, with the potatoes. Discard onions when potatoes are done.

Here is an excellent recipe that can be prepared up to 1 day in advance and holds well on a buffet table. If you buy a single piece of smoked turkey weighing 1/2 pound, it will be easier to cube. Leftover roast turkey can be substituted. Enjoy!

SWEET POTATO & SMOKED TURKEY SALAD

1 1/2 lb. small sweet potatoes (6 to 8 oz. each)
2 cups cubed smoked turkey (1/4-inch cubes)
1 cup diced celery
1/4 cup coarsely chopped pecans, toasted
1/4 cup finely chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley

Dressing:
2/3 cup canola or other vegetable oil
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
3 tbsp. fresh orange juice
3 tbsp. finely grated orange zest
2 tsp. minced fresh ginger
1/2 tsp. curry powder
1/2 tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 400. Scrub sweet potatoes with a stiff brush but do not peel. Prick in several places with a fork. Bake just until tender when pierced with a fork, about 30 minutes. Timing depends on size of potatoes. Alternatively, microwave scrubbed, pricked potatoes on high for 6 to 8 minutes. Remove from microwave, cover with foil and let stand 5 minutes. Do not overcook or they won't cut nicely. Cool completely, then peel and cut into 1/2-inch cubes. Place cubes in a large bowl.

Combine dressing ingredients in a blender, food processor or jar. Process or shake for 30 seconds. You should have about 1 cup.

Add turkey, celery, and from 1/4 to 1 cup of dressing to cubed sweet potatoes and toss gently. Cover and refrigerate for at least 1 hour or up to 1 day. Just before serving, add pecans and parsley; toss well. Serve chilled. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

FOUR SEASONS HOTEL
Toronto

21 Avenue Road, Toronto, Ontario M5R 2G1

The Sheraton Centre: Not Only For Grand Weddings

For nearly 15 years, the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the location of choice for hundreds of happy couples who want a luxurious alternative to a synagogue wedding.

"Many brides and grooms decide they want a traditional kosher wedding, but in a location other than a synagogue," says Jill Crawford, Senior Catering Sales Manager, who specializes in the Kosher market for the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

"The Sheraton Centre is an elegant, unique choice. Combine our dedicated kosher kitchen with our award-winning level of personal service, add your choice of recently-renovated function rooms, and top it all off with an ideal location right in the heart of downtown Toronto, and you've got a recipe for a success! After all, we've been hosting kosher events...from weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, cocktail parties...since 1985, every day of the week (excluding the Sabbath)."

The Sheraton Centre Toronto has a completely separate kosher kitchen, complete with its own china and flatware, strictly supervised by the Kashruth Council of Ontario. "The Kashruth Council's mashgiach has the keys to our kosher kitchen and is present during all preparations and for each and every affair," says Crawford, "so it's not necessary to make the regular kitchen kosher each time.

The experienced and talented chefs offer creative and flexible menus to suit any taste. Both the kitchen and the serving staff are accustomed to dealing with kosher affairs and can easily and professionally handle any concern their clients may have.

It should not be thought that the Sheraton Centre is only for a grand wedding. Facilities and services are available to serve affairs of 200 to 2000 people. "We have facilities," says Crawford, "to fully service a kosher wedding, including being able to offer separate rooms for the signing of the contract, the ceremony and the reception." Indeed, and for those couples who request an outdoor chupah, the Sheraton Centre Hotel has the perfect place: a luscious 2.5-acres of outdoor gardens, complete with waterfalls, right in the middle of the hotel. It certainly makes for a spectacular setting for portraits and family photographs! "No matter whether your plans call for something extremely formal, or more relaxed, our team of catering experts will ensure your wedding day is picture-perfect," states Crawford.

Out-of-town guests will enjoy the Sheraton Centre's convenient location, connected to plenty of City Hall parking, and just steps from some of the best shopping, theatre and sightseeing that Toronto has to offer.

Personalized service, talented, experienced staff, your choice of facilities. An award-winning hotel with a dedicated kosher kitchen, located right in the heart of downtown. No wonder the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the alternative choice to synagogue weddings for nearly fifteen years! For more information, contact

The Registry at William Ashley

THE TOP 10 REASONS TO REGISTER AT WM. ASHLEY

SELECTION: With over 4,000 patterns, William Ashley offers North America's largest selection of china, crystal, silver and gifts to suit your personal style. No other store is able to offer a more extensive selection.

VALUE: Being Canada's Largest Tableware and Giftware retailer, William Ashley is able to offer you and your guests consistently great values on the famous names you know and respect.

PERSONALIZED SERVICES: Our knowledgeable registry consultants look forward to assisting you in creating fabulous table settings and accessories that reflect your combined tastes and new lifestyle. Your consultant will personally record your selections on our computer, and continue to work closely with you throughout your entire registry.

CONVENIENCE: Your guests can either shop in person at one of our two locations or simply phone us and we will assist them in selecting that perfect gift from your registry selections. We also offer toll-free service for your out-of-town guests, as well as computer internet access to your personal registry web site.

IN-STOCK: Wm. Ashley carries more patterns in-stock on an everyday basis than anyone else. This means that your selection will usually be available for your guests to take with them.

COMPUTERIZED REGISTRY LISTINGS: When you register, your selection will be recorded in our computerized Bridal Registry. We can advise your family and friends of your personal preferences. This reduces duplication by ensuring everything you receive is your personal choice.

UNIQUE DESIGNS: We bring you an unequalled selection of famous manufacturers from around the world, many of which are available only at William Ashley.

COMPLIMENTARY SERVICES: We offer our registered couples a wide range of special services, all provided without charge. Free registry consultations, free gift notification service, free gift wrapping, free delivery and many others.

GOURMET SHOPPE: We carry a complete selection of everything you will need for your kitchen. From pots and pans to electric appliances, kitchen knives, cookware and every gadget you can imagine; Wm. Ashley has it all under one roof.

INTERNET ACCESS: As part of our special services to our registered couples, your guests will be able to view your requests from the comfort of their home and make a selection of their choice. Each couple will be issued a personal web site address to give to your friends and family for their convenience.

Ritché Celebrates 50 Years

1952 A young designer begins his career in Canada as a fashion retailer. Fifty years have passed and Ritché is celebrating! The family business is rich with history and continues to grow.

Founder Jack Ritché arrived in Canada, after surviving the Second World War, to start a new life and an exciting fashion career. Canadian women quickly learned of his skills and he developed a clientelle large enough to open a boutique on fashionable Bloor Street. Over the next twenty years his popularity swelled and he became extremely well known for his unique and glamorous bridal designs. Fashion shows with over 1000 excited guests filled hotel ballrooms just to view his new collections.

1981 Jack Ritché's daughter Vivian joined the family business. The store became the destination for any bride to be. New collections of eveningwear and suits by top designers were added to the stores collections.

CELEBRATES

1985 It became apparent that a new central location would be required to properly showcase the expanding collections and the high volume of loyal customers. The current Avenue Road location was designed for the ultimate special occasion store.

The store features large consultation rooms so brides can be both comfortable and have the undivided attention of a knowledgeable consultant. The main floor is spacious and features the latest in fashions for special occasions. There is an entire section devoted to bridesmaids and flowergirls only. The lower level is set up for fittings and accessorising to ensure that everything looks just right.

2002 Today the store is busier than ever. The selection has never been better as the bridal salon features nearly 1000 designer wedding gowns from all over the world. Brides now return with their mothers that had Ritché outfit them with their wedding gown. It has become a family tradition. The family remains committed to personal service.

The Ritché family would like to thank all our loyal customers that have helped us achieve our fifty-year milestone.

RAFAEL STUDIOS
Life Stories In Digital

In 1989, Andy Koltai founded VideOccasions. In June 2002, excited by the artistic potential of the new video technology, Andy's eldest son Tom joined the business; and they moved to a new studio location, changing the company name to RAFAEL STUDIOS.

With over 1,200 clients, RAFAEL STUDIOS has garnered a solid reputation. They offer years of experience, cutting-edge technology, commitment to client satisfaction -- and the skill and sensitivity of an artist.

RAFAEL STUDIOS features full service digital video production for bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, corporate functions, and every other milestone event. Their videos are a pleasure to watch.

Each RAFAEL STUDIOS production is an elegant, stylish work of art in its own right. When they show a demo, it's only a sample of what they can do: your video will be a unique experience. As Tom says, "we don't use templates."

RAFAEL STUDIOS packages are only guidelines, which vary in style, not quality. Whether you like impressive special effects or simple elegance, their work is tailored to your budget and taste.

As a two-man operation with no subcontractors, RAFAEL STUDIOS gives every client individual attention. To them, you matter as a person. As they like making people happy, you can trust them to show you in the best light. And at your event, they will be unobtrusive and low-key, or high-profile and interactive, just as you wish.

The atmosphere at RAFAEL STUDIOS is friendly and hospitable. There are drinks and snacks on hand; you can screen their work at your leisure, in full control. As a one of a kind experience for you and your guests, RAFAEL STUDIOS can produce a custom made short film to be presented at your celebration.

Tom calls their work, "life stories in digital," more like films than videos. He loves a challenging client; RAFAEL STUDIOS strives to capture the moments in your life that make it, and you, special.

You'll find RAFAEL STUDIOS at 5000 Dufferin St., Suite 211; tel: 416.667.9999, fax: 416.667.0113. Email tom@rafaelstudios.ca, Web site www.rafaelstudios.ca.

Memories Begin Here

Be Part of Tradition

Weddings have been part of the Estates of Sunnybrook for almost three-quarters of a century. Thousands of couples have chosen to celebrate their special day at the elegant Vaughan Estate, McLean House or the Coach House.

Vaughan Estate
Elizabethan Elegance

J.J. Vaughan, the original owner, started the tradition of weddings at Vaughan Estate, then known as Donningvale. Today, Vaughan Estate is newly restored and refurbished yet retains all the original heritage character. The signature rooms at Vaughan Estate can hold a reception for up to 160 guests and the Wedding Arbour on the Estate's grounds is quite simply the ideal location for your outdoor ceremony.

McLean House
Georgian Grace

From lush, manicured gardens to elegant rooms with a view, McLean House provides everything for the ideal ceremony and reception. Originally known as BayView and dating to 1929, McLean House offers a selection of signature rooms, each one decorated to reflect the style and ambience of this graceful Georgian manor.

Coach House
A Very Special Place

For couples wishing a more intimate wedding, the Coach House offers the perfect venue for up to 40 guests.

We're Here To Help

From the traditional to the original, our team is here to help you plan the wedding of your dreams. Specializing in exceptional personalized service, the Estates' wedding team is committed to ensuring that your day is exactly how you imagined it.

By choosing the Estates, you know that your investment in your wedding is directed towards furthering vital research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

CCRA seizes pro-Israel literature

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) last week seized and then released a newsletter consisting of pro-Israeli articles after investigating them as possible hate propaganda.

The seizure "shocked" the president of a California-based institute who had sent them to a University of Toronto student club to be distributed during his speaking engagement last weekend.

Material later released
See Editorial page 8

Many of the articles have appeared in the mainstream U.S. press, including the Chicago Sun Times, the Houston Chronicle and the Orange County Register, said Yaron Brook, president of the Ayn Rand Institute (ARI) in Irvine, Calif. Numerous American campus newspapers have run them too, he said.

"There is nothing in them that encourages violence, other than Israel defending itself," said Brook, an Israeli army veteran whose defence of Israel is based on its western values.

Ray Girn, president of the U of T Objectivist Club, which invited Brook to speak, said that on Wednesday of last week, he received a "terse letter" from the CCRA saying the pamphlets had been detained "'for a determination of tariff classification

El Al, Air Canada sign pact

Rivals agree on 'codesharing'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — El Al Israel Airlines and Air Canada, archrivals on the long-haul Toronto to Tel Aviv route, recently signed a "codesharing" agreement that will see each airline book its passengers on the other's flights.

The agreement takes affect Nov. 1 and will permit El Al to offer its passengers flights to Israel seven days a week. In addition, El Al will also codeshare on Air Canada's flights to Montreal, Vancouver, Boston, Chicago and San Francisco.

The agreement comes at a time when airlines around the world are facing difficult economic times and are looking for ways to streamline operations, said Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al's Canadian office.

God bless the Queen: Rabbi Bulka

OTTAWA — Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, will be among several clergy presented to Queen Elizabeth at a multi-faith Thanksgiving service Oct. 13.

According to the itinerary of Her Majesty's 12-day Canadian tour in celebration of her Golden Jubilee, the outdoor service on Parliament Hill is slated for Sunday before representatives of six religions.

Rabbi Bulka is scheduled to recite the Jewish blessing when one sees majesty, and then a short reflection of how majesty derives from God.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien will then present him and the other religious leaders to the Queen.

"It's only poetic justice," Rabbi Bulka told The CJN, "because I was born in London, England. So it's a natural."

ISRAEL

145 Suicide Bombers

JERUSALEM — Since the start of the latest intifadah two years ago, 145 suicide bombers have been dispatched to carry out attacks in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza, officials said. The figure, based on data compiled by the Shin Bet domestic security service, includes would-be bombers caught before carrying out attacks, Ha'aretz reported.

Worshippers Barred

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said he has barred Jewish worshippers from visiting Joseph's Tomb in Nablus. Speaking before the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week, Ben-Eliezer said he issued the ban for safety reasons, adding that anyone trying to enter the area would be arrested.

Conference Hosted

JERUSALEM — Israel last week hosted an academic conference of scientists for what is believed to be the first time since the outbreak of violence two years ago. The three-day conference, Frontiers in Cardiovascular Science, held in Eilat, brought together more than 30 scientists from Israel, Europe and North America to discuss their research on heart disease.

WORLD

Chrétien Honoured

NEW YORK — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien last week received the World Statesman Award from the Appeal of Conscience Foundation (ACF), a New York-based human rights coalition of business and religious leaders that promotes mutual understanding, peace and tolerance in areas of ethnic conflict. In a statement, ACF founder Rabbi Arthur Schneier praised Chrétien "for his commitment to freedom, democracy and tolerance" and his role in creating a new partnership for African aid, developed at the G-8 summit earlier this year in Alberta.

Flood Aid to Survivors

PRAGUE — The Claims Conference is giving $20,000 (US) in emergency assistance to Czech Holocaust survivors affected by massive floods in August. The group allocated the money to the Terezin Initiative, which gives financial assistance to victims of Nazi persecution. The initiative, in co-ordination with the Prague Jewish community and the Czech Federation of Jewish Communities, is finding flood victims temporary housing, buying them equipment, clothing and food and repairing damaged apartments. There are about 1,000 Holocaust survivors in the Czech Republic.

Forum Planned

ANN ARBOR, Michigan — A conference this week at the University of Michigan will consider what to do about "apartheid Israel," the Jerusalem Post has reported. Slated to start Oct. 12, the Second National Student Conference on the Palestine Solidarity Movement urges an end to U.S. aid to Israel and that universities and corporations divest holdings in the Jewish State. Promotional materials also refuse to condemn suicide bombings and say racism is "inherent to Zionism." University president Mary Coleman said the conference agenda doesn't reflect the school's views and that she opposes divestment.

Bush Signs Bill

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. President George W. Bush expressed strong reservations about a bill he signed last week that urges recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital. When he signed the bill, Bush said he would treat the clauses on Jerusalem as a recommendation rather than an order. Among other things, the bill urges the Bush administration to shift the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Treating the Jerusalem provisions as an order would "impermissibly interfere with the president's constitutional authority to conduct the nation's foreign affairs," Bush said.

Philanthropist Dies

PHILADELPHIA — Philanthropist Walter Annenberg died last week at 94. The billionaire publisher and ambassador was close to a succession of U.S. presidents and gave to many Jewish causes.

New Jersey Poet Generates Controversy

NEW YORK— The poet laureate of New Jersey is ignoring calls to quit, for reading a poem insinuating that Israel knew in advance about the Sept. 11 attacks.

New Jersey Gov. James McGreevey called for Amiri Baraka's resignation after Baraka read the following at a festival last month: "Who knew the World Trade Center was gonna get bombed/Who told 4,000 Israeli workers at the Twin Towers/To stay home that day/Why did Sharon stay away?"

Baraka later defended the poem. "Everything said about Israel in the poem is easily researched," he said. "If you criticize Israel, they hide behind the religion and call you anti-Semitic."

The canard about Israeli foreknowledge of, and responsibility for, Sept. 11 has been widely published on the Internet and in the Arab world.

Baraka, a controversial black poet once known as LeRoi Jones, has run afoul of Jewish groups in the past.

PUAH institute explores reproductive technology

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the 24 years since in-vitro fertilization (IVF) was introduced in a British lab, the area of assisted reproductive technologies has undergone rapid development and widespread popularity.

One Web site estimates that 20,000 babies are brought into the world each year thanks to various sophisticated reproductive techniques.

The new technologies have been used by many childless couples, and for observant Jews who take seriously the Torah's first mitzvah – "to be fruitful and multiply" – IVF and other assistive technologies can be a godsend.

But what does Halachah have to say about assisted reproductive technologies? Are IVF, sperm donations or surrogacy halachically permitted?

Attempting to steer the shifting currents where medical technology and religious law intersect, is Israel's PUAH Institute.

PUAH, a Hebrew acronym for Fertility and Medicine in Accordance with Halachah, was created 12 years ago by Rabbi Menachem Burstein as a forum for specially trained halachic experts to meet, consider cases, research earlier precedents, consult with others, and pronounce on the various techniques that were being employed in Israel.

Today, PUAH is housed in a four-storey facility in the heart of Jerusalem. It employs nine rabbis who field more than 100 calls a day from Jews and non-Jews alike, curious about the latest medical techniques and the Jewish view of them.

Rabbi Gideon Weitzman and Rabbi Benjamin David, two of PUAH's rabbinical counsellors, will visit Canada later this month on a trip designed to increase the institute's profile.

Rabbi David will visit Montreal from Oct. 18 to 21 (call 514-737-3029 for more information) while Rabbi Weitzman will be in Toronto from Oct. 22 to 24. During their visits, the rabbis will meet with local doctors, rabbis and couples. From Toronto, Rabbi Weitzman, 35, will continue to Seattle where he will attend a conference of the American Society of Reproductive Medicine.

The PUAH Institute, which relies primarily on private donations, has proven popular because "people want guidelines to new treatments," Rabbi Weitzman said in a telephone interview.

With its advanced medical system, Israel is world leader in the provision of assisted reproductive technologies and many scholarly articles on the subject are penned by Israeli practitioners, he said.

Assisted reproductive technologies can raise a variety of halachic issues including legitimacy and religion of the baby, each of which could affect the child later in life when he or she seeks to marry, Rabbi Weitzman said.

In surrogacy, for example, where a woman agrees to carry another couple's child, the baby would acquire its birth mother's religion, not that of the genetic parents, Rabbi Weitzman said.

The institute has also addressed problems earlier in the process: providing a sperm sample in the conventional manner would violate the religious injunction against masturbation. The institute advises donors the proper way in which to accomplish this crucial aspect of the reproductive cycle while not violating any religious rules, Rabbi Weitzman noted tactfully.

About 12 years ago, the world was alerted to the problems inherent in assisted reproduction when a woman who had undergone IVF gave birth to two children, one white, one black.

Rabbi Mordechai Eliahu, then chief rabbi of Israel, asked Rabbi Burstein, a renowned expert in Halachah and science (he had looked into the science behind the biblical red heifer and Israelite blue dye), to consult with other rabbinic authorities.

Rabbi Burstein "went to the top poskim (halachic experts) for a definitive answer on the law on these developing technologies," Rabbi Weitzman, an English oleh, stated. With the endorsement of numerous rabbinic au-

Anti-Semitism in academia

Founders Assembly Hall in York University was filled to capacity last Sunday afternoon. Every few moments, chairs were added to the empty spaces near the back of the hall to accommodate the flow of people intent on attending the special symposium on Anti-Semitism in Academia, this year's annual lecture in memory of Harry Crowe, the late Canadian scholar-historian whose efforts to help bring about understanding and peace in the Middle East were legendary.

From the editor's desk

The symposium was introduced by Prof. Irving Abella. "Anti-Semitism is a growth industry of the 21st century," Abella said. "And Israel is the declared target, the collective Jew among nations."

To speak about the manifestation of that growth industry in the hallowed halls and cloistered campuses of academia, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University invited Prof. Laurie Zoloth of San Francisco State University and Prof. Menachem Kellner of Haifa University.

Zoloth described frightening and alarming personal experiences at her campus, where she personally witnessed expressions of hatred and vilification directed at Jews on occasions when they had peacefully gathered for religious as well as political purposes.

Speaking rapidly though elegantly, mostly from a prepared text that featured frequent rhapsodic turns of literary phrases and delicate descriptive passages, and as someone who unambiguously identifies with the left, Zoloth rhetorically asked: "Why has the American left turned so much against Israel even to the point of not defending free speech on campus when it comes to Jewish causes?"

Zoloth did not specifically answer the question, but in a moving and biting dissertation, identified five classic, archetypical, medieval anti-Semitic calumnies that have been recently recycled, repackaged and resold by the Arab Muslim world into the conflict with Israel and which have become standard anti-Israel and anti-Jewish rhetoric for a large part of western intelligentsia.

- Deicide: The image of the slain Christ has metamorphosed into the image of the slain Palestinian. The IDF are the Roman soldiers. Of course the offshoot of this pitiable image is the calumny of the blood libel that has recirculated in the Arab world as Israelis using the blood of slain Palestinian children to make matzah for Pesach and hamantaschen for Purim.
- Jews as the source of all ills: Because of the denial of the Christ, or in recycled parlance, because of the continued Jewish "oppression" of the Palestinians, Israel is the central evil in the world from which flow all other evils such as 9/11.
- Jews as not belonging: The Jews do not belong, nor do they have any historic right to be, in Muslim Arab territory. A new, even more alarming variation of this theme is being increasingly heard in Europe, where some serious scholars are saying that Jews do not belong in Europe.
- The all-powerful Jews: The Jews control the world's money and wield inordinate influence on the international media, all western governments and the corporate world.
- Misappropriation of Holocaust imagery: This has led to the intense demonization and Nazification of all things Israeli and Jewish. Or conversely and contradictorily, one hears Denial of the Holocaust. This has led to wild accusations throughout the Arab Muslim world of, essentially, racketeering by the Jews of the world, of preying upon Christian decency and conscience in order to establish a Jewish state.

Through constant, deliberate and shameless reiteration, these five archetypes have melded into an ever more ugly transmogrification within western leftist circles: Israel is seen as a racist, colonial, terrorist, pariah state. And like the only pariah state that has ever existed, i.e., South Africa, there is only one way to deal with it: dismantle it.

Kellner also introduced himself as a traditional progressive from the left side of the political spectrum. A scholar of Jewish medieval philosophy, he illustrated the extent to which anti-Semitism permeates British academia by recounting five distinct examples, including the now famous expulsion by Mona Baker of two Israeli academics from the board of her translation journal.

"The question remains," Kellner said, "why do so many academics and intellectuals buy into the Palestinian narrative and eagerly vilify Israel? Why are Israeli errors placed in the foreground while Palestinian ones are placed in the background?"

- There is a trend of anti-Americanism, which encompasses Israel by association.
- There is natural sympathy for the underdog and since most people see the Palestinians as the underdogs in their struggle with Israel, it is natural to side with the Palestinians.
- Especially in Europe, oil plays a role in steering sympathy as well as government policy towards the Arabs, as does the presence of large numbers of Muslim communities.
- There is a certain intellectual "laziness" in failing to take the time to understand the history of the area.
- Nothing has changed. Anti-Semitism always existed and will always exist.
- Having assuaged their own guilt over the Holocaust, Europeans now take particular delight in pointing an accusing finger at the Jewish state for its alleged crimes.

But Kellner rejected all the above arguments as being simply too inadequate, too incomplete, to account for the unsettling phenomenon of re-emergent anti-Semitism. He did suggest, however, that the answer might lie in an amalgam of all the above answers: Israel is seen – wrongly – by the intellectual left as part of the domineering western hegemony of oppressed and exploited peoples.

In next week's column, I will record how Zoloth and Kellner suggested we should respond to the phenomenon.

ANTI-RACISM PROGRAM GETS FUNDING: York University's Holocaust and anti-racism education program got a welcome boost thanks to the generosity of Mark and Gail Appel (shown centre), who recently donated more than $330,000 toward the initiative. The program, newly named The Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education at York University: Learning from the Past – Teaching for the Future, is intended to help future teachers develop curricular responses to racism and anti-Semitism. York University Foundation president and CEO Paul Marcus and York president and vice-chancellor Lorna Marsden were on hand to acknowledge the gift.

Strain between Europe, Israel seen worsening

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's strained relationship with European nations is likely to worsen if the Palestinian uprising continues to boil over, a former Israeli government official said last week.

Meron Medzini also raised the possibility that the Europeans may impose economic sanctions on Israel if there is not a reduction in the current level of violence and if Israel is perceived as an obstacle to a reasonable political settlement.

Furthermore, he observed in an interview, Israel's already poor image in Europe will probably deteriorate if the intifadah rages on.

Israel's present problems in Europe stem from several factors, explained Medzini, who has served three prime ministers – Levi Eshkol, Golda Meir and Yitzhak Rabin – and has been the director of the Israel Government Press Office:

- the presence of a large and growing Muslim population, which is testing its political clout;
- the enormous fear of an Arab-Israeli war, which might affect the price of oil;
- the uneasiness of many left-wing intellectuals with the notion of Jewish nationalism – Zionism;
- the close linkage of Israel with the United States and of Jews with the phenomenon of globalization.

For these reasons, there has been a resurgence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism throughout Europe, said Medzini, now a senior lecturer at the Hebrew University's Rothberg International School.

Elaborating on the gravity of the situation in Europe, he said that the radical left and the radical right, for the first time, have joined forces with Muslims to lambaste Israel.

In a reference to Europe's mood, he said: "For centuries, Jews were hated because they didn't have a state. Now they're hated because they have a state. You can't win."

Theoretically, the intifadah can go on indefinitely, said Medzini, who was in Canada on a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto information tour and took part in a McGill University academic seminar on the Mideast.

Assessing the impact of the intifadah, Medzini said it has had widespread repercussions.

Apart from devouring the lives of more than 600 Israelis and about 1,800 Palestinians, it has undermined the economies of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, obliterated Israel's ties with such moderate Arab countries as Morocco and Qatar, destroyed Israel's peace camp, rendered Yasser Arafat irrelevant, and radicalized some Israeli Arabs.

By the same token, the revolt has brought Israel greater national cohesion and tightened its relations with the United States.

Appraising the effect of the rebellion on Israeli Arabs, he said, "They're in a terrible bind. They're Palestinians and Israeli citizens."

Medzi said that more and more young and educated Israeli Arabs are demanding a secular state in place of Israel.

"All Israeli governments have been remiss in their treatment of Israel's Arab community," he said, referring, in part, to the unequal allocation of funds to Jewish and Arab municipalities. "It has basically been a policy of neglect."

The current Palestinian leadership supports a two-state solution but only as a temporary measure, he claimed.

Meron Medzini

In his view, the Palestinians will continue to squeeze Israel for further concessions, even after the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Their goal, he said, is to reduce Israel to the status of a small, harmless entity.

Nevertheless, Medzini believes, Israel and the Palestinians can eventually reach a political agreement under which the Palestinians would be granted statehood.

But he doubts whether two other core issues, Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees, can be resolved any time soon.

"Israel can carry on without an overall agreement," he said.

For a settlement to be within the realm of the possible, Israel should be prepared to give up most of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Medzini said. "I would have no difficulty with that."

Should there be a chance for real peace, the majority of Israelis would accept a withdrawal plan based on ideas proposed by Ehud Barak and Bill Clinton two years ago.

He expects the Bush administration to work vigorously for a two-state solution should the United States invade Iraq and unseat Saddam Hussein.

"The United States will have universal support for a two-state solution."

Medzini described himself as "a very disillusioned Labor party man" who is satisfied with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's foreign policy and security position.

He said he stopped supporting the Oslo peace process in 1994 upon concluding that the Palestinians had no intention of halting their anti-Israel incitement campaign.

Adopt-A-Family helps Israeli terror victims

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Sharon Evans' daughter was badly injured in a terrorist attack in Israel about 1½ years ago, Evans searched for a reason for the tragedy.

"My father was a Holocaust survivor, and he taught me that God always has a plan. He said that Israel was born out of the Holocaust, and that answer has always kept me going," said Evans, founder of Adopt-A-Family, an organization that matches Israeli families who have been victimized by terror with synagogues, individuals and organizations in the Diaspora to facilitate a strong connection between communities.

Evans will be in Toronto to share her experiences with terror victims and to talk about the need for Diaspora Jews to help on Oct. 15 at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham and on Oct. 16 at Holy Blossom Temple.

Evans, who was born and raised in Durban, South Africa, said in a telephone interview from Israel that after her daughter Monique Goldwasser, then 19, was taken to the hospital, she was "unconscious and barely breathing, and had both her legs broken, the main artery in her left leg severed, and her intestines perforated.

"The doctors gave her less than one per cent chance of surviving the night, but I told myself that if my daughter was saved, I would take that as a sign to wake the world up to what is happening in Israel. I would take on a mission to become the voice and faith of all victims of terror. I believe that was God's reason for the tragedy."

Monique is now walking, she said, and although she limps quite badly, has a leg that is partially paralyzed and cannot be on her feet for long periods of time, she is "optimistic, and despite having had 15 operations, never complains. She always looks at the up side of things," said Evans, a single mother with three other children.

Adopt-A-Family, which started up about one year ago, has prospered, said Evans. "To date, about 140 synagogues have made financial pledges to participate for one or more years, 90 have been matched with families, and many others are reviewing the program."

At Holy Blossom, after an initial donation of $25,000, the congregation has adopted the family of 51-year-old Baruch Zinger, a father of four, who was killed last December by two terrorists dressed as Israeli soldiers, and is currently taking on a second family.

Pam Albert, chair of the Adopt-A-Family program at the temple, said that the synagogue's relationship with the Zinger family was cultivated when their youngest child Neta, came to Ontario along with 13 other teenagers, to attend summer camp.

"Some of our Holy Blossom students attending camp helped to make their stay as positive as possible, and another Holy Blossom family visited the camp and was able to send a report to Neta's mother in Israel, reassuring her that her child had adjusted well and was having a great time.

"Holy Blossom families visiting Israel have also contacted the Zingers, providing emotional support," said Albert.

"The mother, Nurit, said that she was speechless, and that it warmed her heart to know that Jews so far away were willing to help and to provide moral support. She also said that we have no idea how much this means to the people of Israel."

Evans said that her grassroots organization is geared at getting funds and assistance directly to the families.

"The families know us and know they can approach us 24 hours a day if there is a problem. They know we are not burdened by the miles of red tape associated with the government agencies, and feel that we are there for them and remember them when others seem to have forgotten," she said.

She said that children have become involved in the organization through their school or synagogue. "The requirements for schools are more flexible and we realize that a school will sometimes have a one-time fund-raiser, raise a small sum, and donate it to a family.

"People all over are being unbelievable. The telephone and e-mail has not stopped. I am amazed how the world has stretched out its arms."

The Adopt-A-Family is so simple, said Evans. "We are not asking people to take on all of Israel, we are asking them to make the commitment to help one family rebuild its shattered life. These families need to know that the world cares, and that they are not in this alone."

Do we have reason to be concerned?

What's going on at Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA)? For years, it propounded a harsh, punitive, discriminatory policy regarding humanitarian activities conducted by Jewish charities beyond Israel's pre-June 1967 borders. That policy was finally discredited in the ruling last month by the Federal Court of Appeal as having had no basis in law.

(Despite the ruling,CCRA's campaign to de-register Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom as a charitable organization under the Income Tax Act continues apace, now on other grounds.)

Last week, CCRA confiscated a newsletter entitled In Moral Defence of Israel that was intended for use at a weekend lecture at the University of Toronto. The agency said the confiscation was for the purpose of determining whether the material constituted hate propaganda as defined under the Criminal Code. The brochure, published by the Ayn Rand Institute of California, has since been released by CCRA back to the organizers of the lecture, The Toronto Objectivist Club.

The brochure in question is a mini-anthology of short articles on behalf of Israel in its struggle against the forces that openly seek to inflict harm or much worse upon the Jewish state. Among the titles in the brochure are: Israel has a moral right to its life: Why reason and justice are on Israel's side; Israel's Suicide: The land-for-peace compromise will lead Israel only to self-destruction; Conference in Cloud Cuckoo Land: Mideast peace conference premised on fantasies and evasions of fact; Radical Islam's assault on human life: Anti-reason, anti-freedom ideas in Islam encourage terrorist fanaticism.

In short, the articles in the brochure are of a type that appear in countless journals and newspapers, on the radio and on television, across the country, probably every day of the week.

Dr. Yaron Brook, executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute, described the material as "a collection of reasoned essays arguing for support of Israel against our common enemy, militant Islamic terrorism." He honestly and poignantly makes his purpose plain: "Nowhere in the brochure do we incite hatred or urge any illegal private violent action. We call only for a proper response by government to give Israel the support it deserves."

It stuns the mind that an official at CCRA would even remotely consider the need, let alone the propriety of examining this pamphlet.

Given the undisguised hostility towards Israel and brazenly anti-Semitic attitudes that appear so commonly these days in public discourse, it is now appropriate to ask: Is it incompetence, madness, mischief, or something more malign, more sinister taking root at CCRA? We are on high alert watching. Perhaps others should be watching too.

In defence of Claims Conference

The article, "A survivor's claim against the Claims Conference" (CJN, Sept. 5), was one-sided and did not present a fair evaluation of the good work that the Claims Conference has done over the years. As with all organizations, there are limitations and problems. However, an article that is so critical, without presenting a balanced view or mentioning any positive aspects, only serves to create more anxiety among the survivor community – the fallout of which I see every day.

I am a volunteer on the Information Line for Holocaust Survivors and Their Families at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal. I am a survivor myself, as are all the volunteers on the information line. Our duties involve giving information and referral to survivors regarding restitution and compensation. We also answer survivors' questions about restitution received from the Claims Conference.

The Claims Conference funds a Survivors Assistance Office at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, with a full-time staff person who assists survivors in completing applications for restitution and doing follow-up on previous claims. The information line is a part of this office. In addition, the Claims Conference provides funding for various programs within the support services department of the Cummings Centre.

Recently, the Claims Conference also carried out significant ad campaigns within our local media, notifying survivors of various compensation programs. An example of this is the latest ad, which appeared in the same issue of CJN as Eli Pfefferkorn's article.

Pfefferkorn gives the impression that the Claims Conference is not accountable at all for any of the funds received from Germany. I object to this statement. The Cummings Centre receives annual reports from the Claims Conference on a yearly basis. In November 2001, a representative from the Claims Conference came to our agency to speak to survivors about existing compensation programs, and she brought with her hundreds of annual reports that were distributed. In these reports, there is a breakdown of monies allocated to various communities around the world.

As a volunteer on the front lines, handling (along with other volunteers) hundreds of telephone calls from survivors and as a survivor myself, I speak with staff from the Claims Conference on a regular basis. I have found them helpful, courteous, hardworking and eager to provide information on both the process and individual claims. The conference updates the Survivor Assistance Office on a regular basis as to the number of cases processed, and makes no secret of these figures.

In addition, the Claims Conference regularly sends our agency bulletins with updates on all existing compensation programs. These also include programs that they do not necessarily administer themselves, such as the Swiss funds and the German social security pension. They do this in order to disseminate as much relevant and current information as possible to the survivor community.

Since the start of the second intifadah, I have written dozens of letters to your paper. Now the issue of suicide bombers has been personalized for my family and me.

Jonathan Jesner, a 19-year-old student from Glasgow was on a bus when a Palestinian militant detonated his explosives and killed Jesner and five Israelis. Jesner was my wife's cousin. As you reported, his family allowed a kidney transplant to the person most in need, and it ended up saving the life of a young Palestinian girl.

The number of Israelis killed by suicide bombers is proportionately equivalent to the number of victims of Sept. 11. The world applauded the American response, but Israel is still subject to a double standard when it tries to eradicate the terrorists. When Israel recently attacked Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's compound in Ramallah after the latest murderous attack, the European community and the United Nations condemned Israel. Why is this not the same as the Americans bombing the Talibans and the Al Qaeda in Afghanistan? Surely, it must be clear to all right-thinking persons that Arafat has permitted, if not directed, the cycle of violent attacks on civilians. The ultimate answer for peace between Israel and the Palestinians is the removal of Arafat and his corrupt gang of terrorists.

A big kudo to The CJN for reporting on the left as well as the right in the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, and for making known the views of Peace Now. And a fat raspberry to David Bronfman for suggesting that Peace Now should be ignored. (Letters to the editor, CJN, Sept 5).

There has always been a left as well as a right among Jews in Israel, and neither side has a monopoly on doing what's best or doing what's worst. Left-right differences also exist among Jews in Canada. The two sides cannot afford to ignore each other. They should at least agree to disagree in a civilized manner.

I believe distinguished scholar Emil Fackenheim got it wrong when he compared the recent riot at Concordia to Kristallnacht, the anti-Jewish pogrom of 1938 in Germany (Letters, CJN, Sept. 19). In the latter case, many German Jews lost their lives, businesses were ransacked, synagogues were burned to the ground. None of this occurred at Concordia.

Rather, at a time when the Middle East is a source of inflamed passion and a great deal of bloodshed, the organizers decided to bring a former Israeli prime minister into a hotbed of anti-Israeli activity. What on earth did they expect? The welcome wagon?

There is no logical connection between a badly policed protest and the events of Kristallnacht. I'm tired of people using the Holocaust as a comparison to every event experienced by the Jews. Many true genocides have happened in recent years, and there has been no outcry over these mass murders. Perhaps it is due to the casual way we bandy about references to the Shoah.

Anti-Semitism strong in eastern Europe

By DANIEL ROTH

In hindsight, it seems the anti-Semitism that I encountered in Hungary this past summer was much worse than I realized at the time. Considering how scared and confused I was when it was going on, this is not surprising. But it was not the SS symbols spraypainted in the streets of Budapest or the sometimes scolding looks from the other guests at the hostel where we stayed, as much as it was the experiences we endured on the flight over and at the airport in Hungary.

I am 21 years old and I have been a youth leader in the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement for six years. When I was 16, I went with my age group from Canada and the United States on a leadership program to Israel. This past summer, I led 16-year-old counsellors in training on their leadership program.

The program this past summer had to be changed because of the situation in Israel. In planning the trip, the organizers decided to shorten the time in Israel from five weeks to 2½ weeks and add components in the United States and in Hungary.

Every other summer, Hashomer Hatzair's European members run an eight-day leadership seminar. This summer, we decided to join them since it fit perfectly with our program. Our group would then continue on to Israel for a shorter-than-usual visit. After one week in the United States, we embarked on our journey to Hungary. There were three group leaders, including myself, and 29 program participants. To keep prices to a minimum, we decided to fly Malev, Hungary's national airline. This turned out be an unfortunate choice.

The moment that we boarded the airplane, I began to feel hostility from the Malev staff toward our group. The airline had refused to let us book our seats together, so before we took off, I needed to take attendance to ensure that all the members of our group were accounted for. As I tried to walk up the aisle and count the kids, I was verbally assaulted by two of the flight attendants. I had spoken to both of them moments earlier, explaining the situation and also explaining that as the group leader, any requests that they may have, in terms of keeping the group "civilized" on the flight, should go through me. They were both quite rude to me in English, and were probably even more so in Hungarian. Even before take-off, it was apparent that the staff on this flight was not going to warm to a group of North American Jews.

During the flight, the kids were slightly louder than the other passengers, but the other passengers were not 16 years old and away from home and their parents, not to mention overseas, for the first time. Of course they were excited.

During the flight, one of my charges, Yotam Marom, turned on his personal CD player. When a flight attendant asked him to turn it off, he complied. She then demanded his passport. Not knowing any better, he handed it over.

After he told me what had happened, one of my co-counsellors, Darya Shaikh, and I spent the next three hours negotiating to get it back. After wasting hours of energy and words, they finally, grudgingly, returned the passport.

Throughout the flight, we had been warned that the police were waiting for us at the airport. Of course, we did not believe that we had done anything to warrant arrest. We were wrong.

(The flight staff, we later found out, were well aware that we were continuing on to Israel eight days later and didn't seem to like the idea of a group of Jewish teenagers on the Hungarian national airline. I suppose it was the rude remarks about North Americans along with the comments on the difference between Hungarian airlines and "Jewish" airlines that led me to realize that they knew our flight plan and that we were a Jewish group.)

I exited the airplane in Budapest and noticed an entourage of airport security and Hungarian police waiting just steps from the gate. Darya and Yotam were already being held, physically, by two rather large police officers with shaved heads. One of the flight attendants yelled something in Hungarian and pointed at me as I walked past her. Immediately, two other police officers grabbed me by each arm and dragged me forcefully over to the side of the gate with the others. The rest of our group, with one leader left, were told by the police officers holding us not to stop or look back, but to keep going through customs and the baggage claim.

The three of us, scared and unable to communicate, were taken to the airport police station, where we waited with a number of guards standing over us.

One of the guards said something to us that still echoes in my head. He said: "Next time you want to travel to your country, try flying on your El Al, maybe they will like you better."

Luckily, the leader of Hashomer Hatzair in Hungary saw us as we were dragged through the airport and came to try to help us. She was like an angel and was very helpful because she spoke Hungarian. However, the officers would only explain to her that there was nothing she could do to help us and then they stopped talking to her. So we waited and waited. After five hours of staring at the blank walls of the small room in which we were being held, one of the officers announced that the report was written and that we were being charged with a number of offences.

The charges were as broad as "not complying with airline rules" to "stealing life vests from under the seats." Many of the charges had been thought up by the flight attendants and some of them were clearly invented by the police as they were writing the report.

Not once were we even asked for our side of the story.

We were then placed in a police car and taken to a police station in Budapest. Once there, we waited again, until a woman called us into her office, where our sentences were handed to us. Being under 16, Yotam was let go. But Darya and I were each given fines of about $40 (US) and suspended sentences for two years, and we were all warned that if we caused any more trouble, we would be thrown in prison.

After a full day, jet-lagged and dirty, and after being held in one small room after another and bombarded with dirty looks and anti-Semitic remarks, we were finally let go. We paid the fine and rejoined our group. Some were in shock, some were crying. They showered us with hugs and kisses.

I have been to Israel nine or 10 times, but this time it felt different. I felt safe from the intolerance we endured that first day in Hungary. What really got to me was not the anti-Semitism (I am aware that it still exists in this world), it was that this time it came to us not from people on the street that maybe don't know better. This time the hate came from representatives of the country, its government and its institutions.

I have a feeling that, like me, most people are not aware that they are being discriminated against until they actually experience it.

Anti-Semitism comes in many forms and from many places. As a member of Hashomer Hatzair and as a teacher in the Jewish community, it's my responsibility to make as many people as possible aware of intolerance and hate, so that one day we may be able to stamp it out.

I have contacted officials at the Hungarian Consulate in Toronto with my story and I have asked for an official apology from the government.

Thoughts on aging

Our long-standing, renowned columnist Rabbi Gunther Plaut will be celebrating his 90th birthday on Nov. 1, please God. CJN staff reporter Carolyn Blackman recently spoke with Rabbi Plaut in the quiet serenity of his living room. In the course of her research for the interview with Rabbi Plaut, she came across numerous other interviews and talks he has given, and stories written about him. As a precursor for the Blackman interview that will appear in The CJN in the next few weeks, we have excerpted for this space this week, a sampling from some of those articles.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

* * *

At a recent conference on Aging Smart held at the Canadian College of Naturopathic Medicine, Rabbi Plaut talked about growing older.

"Older people have it all over the younger set. I find they're more truly alive because they have less stress, they no longer have to compete, and have few family responsibilities.

"They can also take on new challenges that require no schooling."

His wife has been hospitalized for about two years, he said, and he has learned to care for himself. "You don't need a PhD to learn to cook and clean a house."

Rabbi Plaut's book The Price and Privilege of Growing Old was reviewed in The CJN by columnist Bernard Baskin after the book was released about four years ago.

In the book, Rabbi Plaut talked about his resentment of those who want to relegate the elderly to the "ash heap of society.

"I am eager to rescue the term 'old' from its present disparaging connotation and raise it to the level where the elderly are given a heightened sense of self-respect.

"Age is a relative matter. If you continue to work and absorb the beauty in the world about you, you find that age does not necessarily mean getting old. At least not in the ordinary sense. I feel many things more intensely than ever before, and for me life grows more fascinating."

In addressing the topic of religion, Rabbi Plaut said that it is definitely an aid against loneliness and despair.

"Having spent the major part of my life in a religion-based environment, I have consistently found that people with a strong belief in a meaningful universe – which, after all, is the foundation of religion – have a sense that each person's life is important and that a loving God provides each one of us with the kind of life support that helps us to be at peace with the world."

Religious observance, he says, adds structure to one's life, especially when the regimen of regular work or structured activity is no longer possible.

At the conference, Rabbi Plaut advised participants to "keep agreements and love yourself, and you'll live to be 100."

The Israeli world on stage

If theatre is an indication of the creative impulse in a society, then that impulse exists in abundance in Israel. Over the Sukkot holiday two weeks ago, 200,000 Israelis attended the annual fringe theatre festival in Acco. There, many of Israel's budding playwrights presented their take on topical social issues and human relationships.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

And over the summer, several plays I saw provided ample evidence, yet again, that Israeli theatre is not only prolific but exceptionally creative. Since the language barrier prevents most visitors to the country from attending local productions, theatre remains more of an indigenous cultural experience than dance, music or the visual arts. This is unfortunate, as it denies even many who are close to Israel the opportunity to peer into the soul of the country through its most talented, dramatic writers and artists.

I recently attended three Israeli productions that attest to the breadth and diversity of Israel's theatrical experience. Gesher, the renowned company created by Russian immigrant director Yevgeny Aryeh and his group of immigrant actors, performed Isaac Bashevis Singer's The Slave. During the last decade, Gesher has established a new standard in stage acting and production for the entire Israeli theatre community. By combining the best of the Russian classical tradition with a new language and venue, it has created a unique, exhilarating product. At more than three hours long, The Slave has been critically hailed for its moving portrayal of the plight of Jews in Czarist Russia and its imaginative, evocative stage design.

At the other end of the spectrum, I saw Finding Elijah, winner of the first prize at last year's Acco festival. In 90 uninterrupted minutes, this compelling assault on the audience's hearts and minds told the story of one family's search for their missing soldier son during the Yom Kippur War and made a wrenching, critical statement about life, loss, nationalism and war. To many in the visibly stunned audience, the play hit close to home in its questioning of the futility of battle in a war that, in retrospect, some feel could perhaps have been avoided.

Longings was unique in a different way. Produced by the Jewish-Arab Theatre in Jaffa, it presented the personal narratives of several refugees among Jewish and Arab Israelis. For the Jewish characters, the Holocaust was the searing, formative experience; for the Arabs, it was the need to abandon their homes during the 1948 fighting. In the play, it was precisely the common experience of human suffering and displacement that opened a window of understanding for people separated by a deep divide of history and identity.

The theatre itself was established just two years ago by an Israeli-Jewish and and Israeli-Arab director. On summer weekends, the historic building in old Jaffa hosts jam sessions that combine classical jazz with indigenous Arab music. The result is an exciting blend of traditions and cultures that crosses boundaries.

And then there was a foreign play that reflected the outsider's ironic perspective. In a revival of his successful, 1997 one-man play, Via Dolorosa, British playwright David Hare remained surprisingly relevant. He had set out to understand the essence of a conflict that defied his European sensibilities, yet fascinated him enough to take the time to carefully listen to the stories of both Israelis and Palestinians. Watching an outsider's wry commentary is not always easy for anyone deeply attached to one side in the conflict. I squirmed in my seat more than once, but I had to acknowledge that Hare "got it." Via Dolorosa has played in Israel, in Hebrew, to full houses.

The scope of Israeli cultural energy puts the lie to the saying that when the guns begin shooting, the muses fall silent. In fact, over the last two years, a new generation of playwrights and filmmakers has used its creative gifts to confront tough questions on Israel's agenda.

In theatres and cinemas, there is a richness of independent, original productions, while attendance numbers confirm not just Israelis' unusually high cultural consumption, but their desire to maintain the routine nature of life as much as possible.

To fully take the pulse of the country, go see an Israeli play or film. If the daily press tells the story of what is happening, stage and film tell the story of what people across the spectrum are feeling and thinking.

Freedom of speech, not freedom for violence

The recent disgraceful assault on both citizens and the principle of free speech at Concordia University has illustrated how confused even supposed experts are on the issue.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) is perhaps the major agency designed to protect academic freedom and freedom of speech on Canadian campuses. They have routinely issued press releases on matters relevant to the Middle East, condemning, for example, the bombing on the Mt. Scopus campus of the Hebrew University. They put out a press release following the Concordia riot, which at first glance, seemed to say all the right things, and even appeared to be "balanced" on the Middle East itself. But closer inspection revealed a bias tilted against Israel, and also supporting a surprisingly restrictive concept of free speech.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The statement focused on three troubling incidents. The first was the Concordia affair: the CAUT condemned both the angry protest which led to the cancellation of the speech and the subsequent decision of the administration to impose a moratorium. This has the effect as treating both sides as in some way equivalent. In fact, while the moratorium idea can be debated, one must sympathize with Concordia administrators who feared that the situation might spiral out of control and result in a loss of public confidence in the university.

The CAUT statement also deplored two other episodes where supporters of Israel were tarred as free speech opponents. The first referred to the attempt by pro-Israeli groups to have the University of Toronto administration discipline faculty members who had circulated a petition on university e-mail harshly critical of Israel. The second referred to protests by pro-Israeli and other groups at the University of Colorado and Colorado College, where PLO spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi had been invited to speak.

All these incidents were lumped together as comparably undermining free speech. But in fact there are important differences.

Only at Concordia was violence used, including physical assaults, verbal assaults and threats. Only at Concordia did this loud intimidation lead to the actual cancellation of the event. Certainly, Ashrawi's lectures in Colorado went on without incident.

The fact is that for the past several years, there have been harshly anti-Israeli and borderline anti-Jewish speakers who have spoken regularly at Concordia without any violence. Many of these lectures were held Friday night, ensuring that religious Jewish students might not be able to attend. The intimidating harassment that has been rife at Concordia over the past few years has been directed at Jews and supporters of Israel.

More distressing is the underlying premise at work here. CAUT seems to feel that once a university invitation is extended, or once some university-based activity commences, then any criticism which emanates from those with different views is somehow illegitimate and a suppression of free speech.

This is of course ridiculous. Citizens and members of a university community have every right to protest against a current or impending action taken by a university or by a unit in the university. Pro-Palestinian students have every right to object to invitations to speakers, and to hold peaceful protests at the speaking event. And pro-Israeli students have the right to do likewise.

Indeed, trying to convince university authorities to reconsider a decision is not opposition to free speech, it is the exercise of free speech. It is part of vigorous debate. (By the way, while not required, universities should always strive to ensure that controversial speakers invited to a campus can be questioned – in a civil fashion -- by faculty or students who might have opposing views.)

The problem at hand is the use of force, or the threat of the use of force, to lead to the actual prevention of people from speaking. And that is clearly unacceptable. That is what took place at Concordia, and why Concordia's event evoked in some of those present memories of brown-shirted hooligans.

The Kirshner File

The recent Toronto International Film Festival yielded a bumper crop of movies of Jewish interest, some of which will open in commercial release soon.

Having read the handwriting on the wall, Jews in wartime Europe desperately sought to escape the murderous onslaught of Nazism. In 1940, 2,000 Jewish refugees from Germany, Austria, Hungary and Czechoslovakia boarded the Atlantic – a rusty ship bearing the Panamanian flag of convenience – in Romania, a country under fascist rule. Their destination was Palestine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The voyage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean was perilous. The Atlantic, while seaworthy, was so overcrowded that it tilted dangerously. Passengers waited for hours to use the unsanitary facilities. There was a shortage of food and water, and disease was rampant. Children who succumbed to illness were thrown into the water by their distraught parents.

On a stopover in Greece, sympathetic authorities provided the refugees with bread and water. Somewhere in the Mediterranean, the Atlantic ran out of coal, forcing the crew to literally dismantle the ship so that its wooden components could be consumed as fuel. Two British torpedo boats refused a call for help, and when the Atlantic docked in Cyprus, the passengers were not allowed to disembark.

Eventually, the Atlantic reached Haifa. But within days, on the heels of a decision by Britain to deport the refugees, the ship set sail for a prison on the Indian Ocean island of Mauritius. A typhoid epidemic killed scores of the new arrivals. The rest were permitted to return to Palestine in the summer of 1945.

Atlantic Drift focuses on Hanna Haendel and her son, Shlomo, whose father, Fritz, committed suicide on the day she discovered she was pregnant with him. Shlomo, haunted by Fritz's untimely death, persuades his mother to join him on a trip to Mauritius. There they visit Fritz's grave site and speak to a former British prison guard who dredges up memories of that bitter, bygone era.

Skillfully blending history with personal reminiscences, this is a film that sheds new light on the plight of Jewish refugees during the Holocaust and Britain's policy on that issue.

Caroline Link's feature film, Nowhere in Africa, based on an autobiographical novel by Stefanie Zweig, also deals with the theme of displacement. The focus is on an assimilated German-Jewish family trying to adapt themselves to their new home in rural Kenya.

During the first few moments, the scenes shift between Nazi Germany and the British colony of Kenya, creating a sharp and culturally dissonant juxtaposition. Walter Redlich, a lawyer, has left Germany and pines to be reunited with his wife, Jettel, and their daughter, Regina, the narrator. Jettel (Juliane Kohler) arrives in Kenya on April 20, 1938, Adolf Hitler's birthday, having left her parents behind. Her father, a hotelier, is hopeful that the persecution of Jews will end within a year or two.

Jettel, the personification of a spoiled bourgeois woman, is aghast by the spartan conditions on the remote farm Walter (Merab Ninidze) manages. "We can't live here," she exclaims in exasperation. News of Kristallnacht in Germany chastens her, but Jettel remains xenophobic, and her marriage deteriorates. Regina (Lea Kurka and Karoline Eckertz), however, adapts brilliantly to Kenya. The family weathers a series of crises, from Walter's internment as an enemy alien to Jettel's brief affair with a fellow refugee. As these events occur, Jettel and Walter learn that their parents have been swept up by the Holocaust.

Unfolding to the rhythmic beat of African drums and the harsh beauty of Kenya's countryside, the film reaches its climax when Walter and Jettel must decide whether or not to go back to Germany. Nowhere is Africa is a solid, workmanlike film, brimming with local colour and seething with tension. Strangely enough, though, it is emotionally shallow.

Traudl Junge

Max, written and directed by Menno Meyjes, is interesting but ultimately static. Max Rothman (John Cusack), a Jewish painter from Munich, returns from the battlefields of World War I, minus his right arm. He opens an avant garde art gallery, selling works by Paul Klee and George Grosz. There he meets a jobless and homeless aspiring artist. His name is Adolf Hitler (Noah Taylor). Feeling pity for his fellow war veteran, Rothman takes Hitler, wild and scruffy, under his wing. He has hopes that Hitler has it within him to create an "authentic voice" on canvas.

Max, which is essentially about their budding relationship, goes to great lengths to reconstruct what is supposedly Hitler's evolving views of Jews. "I don't believe in anti-Semitism," Hitler says shortly after meeting Rothman. The so-called Jewish question, he explains, should be left to the state, much like public heath and sewage. But as Hitler comes under the corrosive influence of a racist army captain, who speaks glowingly of blood purity and menacingly about Jews, he joins the fledgling national socialist party.

In the wake of the 1919 Treaty of Versailles, as one graphic scene suggests, Hitler evolves into a full-blown anti-Semitic agitator cum propagandist. Rothman attempts to convince Hitler to leave politics, giving him an advance to pursue his artistic dreams. But Hitler, not surprisingly, is a lost cause. He now believes that politics is the "new art." Similarly, Rothman fails to dissuade Hitler from embracing the captain's destructive racial theories.

Although Rothman has a soft spot for Hitler, he has no illusions about him. "You're an awfully hard man to like," he observes in one testy exchange. Rothman's mistress (Leelee Sobieski), completely agrees. "He's the most horrible creature I've ever seen," she declares. As portrayed by Taylor in an over-the-top performance, Hitler is indeed a repulsive character, a person to avoid at all costs.

The imaginary story Meyjes has concocted simmers with possibilities. What might have happened had Hitler met with success as an artist? But Max fritters away its potential, Cusack's bold presence notwithstanding, and lapses into dullness.

The living, breathing, fuming Hitler – the genuine article – is the subject of Blind Spot: Hitler's Secretary, a riveting documentary by Andre Heller and Othmar Schmiderer.

Plucked from a clerical pool, she was an impressionable 22-year-old typist – the product of a dysfunctional and apolitical family – when she was thrust into the Fuhrer's inner circle. The subservient Junge, who married Hitler's man servant in 1943, looked up to her boss, considering him a father figure. He was a "kindly old gentleman" who treated her with respect and solicitude. But after a while, she revised her opinion of Hitler.

Puffing on a cigarette, she coolly describes him as "an absolute criminal," a person who resorted to "barbaric measures" and to whom human life meant nothing. Junge, 81 when she was interviewed, implies she was never a Nazi.

Junge discloses that Hitler rarely raised Jewish issues in her company. But after he was slightly injured in a 1944 assassination plot, Hitler railed against Jews and Bolsheviks. And on the eve of his suicide, when he dictated his last will and testament to Junge, he blamed the Jews for Germany's imminent defeat.

Junge claims Hitler lost touch with reality in the penultimate year of the war. Nevertheless, she admits candidly, she was reluctant to let go of her "positive image" of him. In the last few months before his death, they shared a shadowy existence in a dank Berlin bunker, losing track of night and day as they shuddered to the deafening roar of bombs and artillery fire. Realizing the end was near, Hitler slurred his words and his face assumed a blank stare.

In spite of her proximity to him, Junge claims she had no idea of what was going on in the outside world. As she tells it, she learned of the Holocaust only in 1946. She comes close to breaking down once, when she chillingly describes the dismal fate that awaited Joseph Goebbels' wife and her daughters.

The Nazi, set in an Israeli penitentiary in 1987, turns on the nature of forgiveness. Helen, a half-Jewish woman whose grandparents survived the concentration camps, has come to visit Franz, who is modelled after war criminal Adolph Eichmann. She wants to forgive him because she can no longer bear the hatred welling up in her. But Franz is condescending and unleashes an anti-Semitic tirade. At best, the moral of this quirky film is ambiguous.

Fuhrer Ex is adapted from the true story of Ingo Hasselbach, an east German neo-Nazi who turned against the movement and wrote the first insider account of it. The film, directed by Winfried Bonengel, is not nearly as good as Hasselbach's searing 1996 memoir. It is plagued by a surfeit of seemingly gratuitous violence and a shortage of reflection, and a viewer never really learns why Hasselbach, the son of a senior Communist official, embraced and propagated anti-Semitism.

Japanese choir returns to Temple Sinai

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shinonome, a Japanese Christian choir, is returning to perform at Temple Sinai on Oct. 20, its third performance at the synagogue in the past 10 years.

The choir is the musical arm of a Japanese Protestant church, the Japanese Christian Friends of Israel (JCFI), or in Hebrew, Beit Shalom.

The church was founded by Takeji Otsuki, following revelations he said he received 50 years ago in Manchuria that convinced him that only harmonious co-operation between Jews and non-Jews could bring about the Messiah. Otsuki, who founded the Mzra Society of Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has since received an honorary doctorate from the institution.

Church members pray for peace in Israel and believe that only when a permanent peace is established will the peace of the world be realized. Among church activities, JCJI holds special meetings once a month to which Jewish lecturers are often invited. It also runs short-term residences in several places throughout the country that are used by Jewish visitors.

Choir members, many of whom are church ministers, professionals, businesspeople and seminary students, come from many of the denomination's 100 churches throughout Japan.

Ben Steinberg, composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai, says that members finance their own trip and do not charge for their performance, but in order to raise money for victims of terror in Israel, they have decided jointly with the temple to charge $18 general admission, or $16 for seniors and students.

Steinberg, who has been invited to Japan three times and has conducted choirs across the country, said the first half of the Oct. 20 program will consist of Japanese folk and dance music, while the second half will be Israeli folk songs and Jewish liturgical texts, including several Steinberg works sung with Temple Sinai cantor Gershon Silins.

Many choir members speak Hebrew, said Steinberg, and the choir president plans on giving a speech in Hebrew.

"I was once conducting a choir in Boston, and when I tried to converse in English to a Shinomone member, he told me in Hebrew that he does not speak English but does understand Hebrew."

Tickets are available at the temple office or by calling 416-487-4161.

Noted historian to address lecture

Noted historian, author and speaker Rabbi Berel Wein will speak on the topic, Personal Righteousness and Civic Responsibility, at the first annual Rebbitzen Judy Taub Memorial Lecture.

Rabbi Wein, formerly a pulpit rabbi in Monsey, N.Y., has written several books and many articles. He now lives and works in Israel, where he teaches at Ohr Somayach and Beit Knesset Hanasi, writes a column for the Jerusalem Post and produces animated films about great Jewish personalities.

The event, sponsored by the sisterhood, will be held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, Oct. 15, at 8 p.m. There is no charge.

The speech will be preceded by a private dinner for the Taub family and shul members.

Together with her husband, Rabbi Baruch Taub, she helped found the synagogue in 1981, and was instrumental in starting the sisterhood and developing it into a major force in the life of the congregation.

Over the years, she was very involved in what was going on both in the synagogue and in the lives of the congregants. She was especially known for her teaching of bat mitzvah girls and brides. For more information, call the synagogue at 905-886-3810.

Jewish day school appointments for 2002–2003

COMMUNITY HEBREW ACADEMY OF TORONTO

After four years at the school, Paul Shaviv has been appointed the director of education, a newly created post. He has master's degrees from both Cambridge and Oxford universities, and has a long career in Jewish high schools.

Paul Shaviv

Jerry Tollinsky joined the school last year as the director of development, charged with creating the necessary resources for the school. He was formerly with Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

legacy of life — Morris B. Kaufman 1911 – 1997

Looking around Rose Kaufman's Toronto home, it's obvious family plays an integral role in her life. Smiling faces radiate from dozens of photographs perched proudly on coffee tables and sideboards and on walls and shelves. It's a scene that brings great warmth and tranquility not only to Mrs. Kaufman but also to anyone she welcomes into her home.

"When Morris died, the community lost a good one," says Mrs. Kaufman as she lovingly leafs through dozens of photo albums and newspaper articles piled high on her bedroom bookshelf. "I have so many plaques and not enough walls to put them on."

Morris Kaufman earned countless plaques and much praise during his lifetime for his steadfast devotion to his people and his community. His forté was fundraising and he did it with style, single-handedly raising millions of dollars for communities in Toronto and Israel. He served as UJA's Campaign Chair in 1966 and was involved in numerous organizations including UJA Federation's Endowment Fund (now called the Jewish Foundation), State of Israel Bonds, Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Jewish National Fund and Associated Hebrew Schools. He supported a host of Israeli universities and was a central figure in the creation of Beth Tzedec Congregation, eventually becoming its president.

By all accounts, there wasn't a cause that didn't have a Kaufman connection.

"I can still remember Morris' words," recalls Wilfred Posluns, who credits Mr. Kaufman with getting him involved in community service years ago. "When it came to UJA, he'd say, 'That's motherhood.' When it came to Jewish education, he'd say, 'Without education there won't be Jews.' He was persistent and he believed in his cause. And people responded willingly."

The reason he did it was simple: Morris was a proud Jew. Says Rose: "He always said, 'Remember who you are and where you come from.'"

"MBK," as he was affectionately called, was born in 1911 in Galicia and moved to Sarnia, Ont., in his early teens to live with his aunt. Soon after, young Morris found work in a Sarnia scrap metal yard and peddled his wares by horse and buggy, learning to speak English on the fly and going to school at night. By 15, he was active in Zionist youth groups and later joined B'nai Brith. By 20, he had saved enough money to bring his mother and six siblings to Canada. They all settled in Toronto, where Morris met and married Rose. He went on to build the hugely successful Toronto Refiners and Smelters.

"The same driving force that resulted in my Dad becoming a self-made financial and industrial success drove him as far as the Jewish community was concerned," says daughter Lynn Sigel. "He was a family man, and the Jewish community was simply an extension of his family."

When people think of Morris, they can't help but smile. They say he always arrived at meetings with his pockets full of papers, and at a critical moment would reach deep into those pockets and produce a paper to support his argument. Anyone who had a conversation with Morris was bound to learn a new Yiddish proverb or a Hebrew phrase plucked from the Bible or the Talmud. He loved the outdoors, be it his cottage on Lake Simcoe, fishing in Canada, Israel or the U.S., golfing or swimming.

But what they most admire is that Mr. Kaufman drew people close. His passion for Israel and the Jewish people sparked many others to follow in his footsteps, including his family. His children Lynn, Deenna and Ira are all involved in Jewish community work and his eldest grandson, Anthony Sigel, has also taken on a leadership role.

"Morris had such enthusiasm and a drive for success," says Mr. Posluns. "He had this way of convincing you of the needs in the community and the efforts that had to be put in to get there. He made you want to participate, to work with him, to raise money, to give money. It was what he was all about."

"This codeshare agreement underscores El Al's commitment to achieving and enhancing the level of service on this route even during these difficult times in the airline industry and for Israel as a whole," added Rami Fischer, El Al's manager for Canada.

El Al's fall and winter schedule offers flights to Israel on Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday. Under the newly inked arrangement, passengers wishing to travel on other days will be booked on Air Canada while El Al's 6,000 frequent flyer members will continue to earn points flying on the codeshared Air Canada routes, Morais said. El Al will increase its flight frequency to four per week for the busy summer season, he added.

Air Canada also announced it was signing a codesharing agreement with Lufthansa for flights from Frankfurt to Tel Aviv. The Canadian airline touted the agreement as improving its customers' choices for daily flights to Israel while enhancing convenience for those who want to make a stopover in Europe.

"These codeshare agreements benefit Air Canada's customers by providing easy access to a greater choice of flights," said Bill Bredt, vice-president, Network and Revenue Management. "We constantly strive to provide our customers with superior schedules, so in addition to maintaining our four times weekly operation, we are very pleased to offer our customers this improved schedule with El Al and Lufthansa."

Under a codesharing agreement, each airline books a block of seats on the other's flights and offers them to its passengers using the booking airline's tickets. However, passengers switching between airlines will still have to change planes and even terminals in Toronto, Morais acknowledged.

El Al has previously initialed similar agreements with Iberia Airlines and Delta. "It's almost like a strategic alliance that allows airlines to offer passengers seamless travel and more options, more days," he said.

Although travel to Israel is down as a result of the security situation, the airline posted respectable numbers on the Tel Aviv route this summer. Offering four flights per week on the airline's new 282-seat Boeing 777s, El Al flew at 90 per cent capacity, Morais said.

Still, travel to Israel is down overall in recent years, and more than 60 hotels have been forced to close due to lack of business. Jewish passengers, travelling as part of missions, groups or organizations, continue to choose El Al as a way of helping the country's national airline and Israeli workers, Morais said. However, "the numbers are nothing like they were in the past" for Christian groups, which once made up a substantial proportion of El Al's passenger traffic.

On another issue, Morais said the Toronto office had no information about recent reports the Israeli government is considering privatizing the airline and how that might affect flights from Canada. News reports from Israel, quoting the cabinet secretary, indicated El Al will be sold to private investors. That reversed an earlier decision to keep 51 per cent of the company in the hands of the government.

According to the new plan, approved by a ministerial committee, 49 per cent of the company would be sold in the first part of 2003 and the remainder would be sold in phases.

Home for the Holidays

'Home for the Holidays' is a practical 'how-to' series of workshops designed to help you take home the holiday and practice it in a meaningful, enjoyable, and knowledgeable way.

Shabbat Workshop

Sunday, Oct. 27, 7:00 PM

151 Eglinton Ave. W. (4 blocks west of Yonge)

Take home new ideas, tunes and resource materials, plus a 'loot bag' filled with some of the ritual items you'll need.
Each workshop will offer hands-on experience for both beginners ("I've never done Shabbat before...") and those familiar with Shabbat looking to enhance their Shabbat celebration.

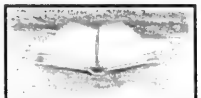
Equal in the eyes of our Creator

By RABBI JORDAN D. COHEN



Rabbinic Reflections

After disembarking from the Ark, the first thing Noah does is build an altar and offer a burnt offering to God. The Holy One acknowledges Noah's offering and in return promises never again to destroy the earth, despite the human inclination to do evil.

Rashi notes that the repetition of the promise, "Never again... nor will I ever again..." indicates that this promise is delivered as a solemn oath. This notion is reinforced by the prophet Isaiah in this week's Haftarah: "For this to Me is like the waters of Noah. As I swore that the waters of Noah would nevermore flood the earth, so I swear that I will not be angry with you or rebuke you." (Isaiah 54:9). God then confirms this oath for all time with the symbol of the rainbow.

Since that time, God has kept this solemn promise. Humankind, on the other hand, has continued to give in to the evil inclination. Immediately after the covenant, we see Noah getting drunk, Ham's sexually aberrant behaviour, and the arrogance of the builders of the Tower of Babel.

So what is the difference between the generations before the flood, when "the Eternal saw how great was human wickedness on earth, and how every inclination of their heart's cunning was nothing but evil all the time" (Genesis 6:5) and the generations after the flood, when "the inclinations of the human heart are evil from his youth" (Genesis 8:21)? Did the flood have any effect at all? Did human nature change at all? It would appear not.

There have been no fundamental changes in humanity since creation. The DNA of Adam and Eve was passed down through Noah and his wife and on to all the generations that followed.

What did change, however, is how God deals with humanity. After the deluge, the world is given another chance. But this time God is not taking any chances. After the flood, the new world order is defined by covenant and law. God knows that human beings have an inclination to do evil, and so this time, safeguards are put in place.

This first covenant is made with the b'nai Noach – the children of Noah, the progenitor of all humans to follow. It will be another 10 generations before God makes the special covenant with Abraham that marks God's specific relationship with the Jewish people and is characterized by the observance of the mitzvot.

But even before the covenant with Abraham, the rabbis of the Talmud teach us, there are seven precepts that are incumbent upon all peoples. All humans must avoid idol worship, incest, murder, blaspheming God's name, theft, injustice and eating flesh cut from a live animal (Sanhedrin 56a-b).

The late Rabbi Pinchas Peli, author and biblical commentator, points out that "if God is, as He is in the Bible, the creator of all human beings, He could not have cared only for Israel and instructed them exclusively in the way of living." From this point on, with the introduction of Abraham at the end of parshat Noach, the story becomes the story of the Jewish people. But before we were Jews, we were humans, and before the 613 mitzvot were set for the children of Israel, seven laws were established for the children of Noah. Like all the descendants of Adam, we struggle with our very human inclination to do evil. But with the establishment of God's covenant with Noah and the giving of law, we all stand equal in the eyes of our Creator.

Evidence says PLO was not neutral in Gulf War

MYTH:

The PLO was neutral in the Gulf War.

FACT:

The PLO, Libya and Iraq were the only members who opposed an Arab League resolution calling for an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. The intifadah leadership sent a cable of congratulations to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, describing the invasion of Kuwait as the first step toward the "liberation of Palestine."

PLO leader Yasser Arafat played a critical role in sabotaging an Arab summit meeting that was to have been convened in Saudi Arabia to deal with the invasion. Arafat, the New York Times reported, "diverted attention from the planned summit and helped capsize it" by showing up in Egypt with a "peace plan" devised by Libyan dictator Moammar Gadhafi.

According to an eyewitness account by Al-Ahram editor Ibrahim Nafei, Arafat worked hard to "water down" any anti-Iraq resolution at the August 1990 Arab League meeting in Cairo. Arafat "moved from delegation to delegation, hand in hand with Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi foreign minister, who was openly threatening some Gulf and other Arab delegates that Iraq would turn them upside down," Nafei wrote (Al-Ahram, Aug. 12, 1990).

In Amman, Jordan, a PLO official warned that Palestinian fighters had arrived in Yemen.

"We expect them to take suicidal operations against the American troops in Saudi Arabia if the Americans move against Iraq," he declared. "There are more than 50,000 Palestinian fighters" in both Kuwait and Iraq, he said, who "will defend the interests of Iraq" (United Press International, Aug. 10, 1990).

Abul Abbas, a member of the PLO executive committee, threatened that "any American target will become vulnerable" should the United States attack Iraq (Reuters, Sept. 4, 1990).

In Jenin, Aug. 12, 1,000 Palestinians marched, shouting: "Saddam, you hero, attack Israel with chemical weapons" (Associated Press, Aug. 12, 1990).

According to a variety of sources, the PLO played an active role in facilitating Iraq's conquest of Kuwait. The logistical planning for the Iraqi invasion was at least partially based on intelligence supplied by PLO officials and supporters based in Kuwait. One Arab diplomat was quoted in the British newspaper The Independent as saying that on arrival in Kuwait, Iraqi officials "went straight to their homes, picked them up and ordered them to go to work."

The Iraqi Embassy had compiled its own list of key Kuwaiti personnel, said the diplomat, "but who helped them? Who were the skilled technicians who worked alongside the Kuwaitis and knew all this information?" he asked. ("The Palestinians," Jerusalem Post, Aug. 8, 1990).

When the United States began massing troops in Saudi Arabia, Arafat called this a "new crusade" that "forebodes the gravest dangers and disasters for our Arab and Islamic nation." He also made clear his position on the conflict: "We can only be in the trench hostile to Zionism and its imperialist allies who are today mobilizing their tanks, planes, and all their advanced and sophisticated war machine against our Arab nation" (Sawt al-Sha'b, Sept. 4, 1990).

Once the war began, the PLO executive committee reaffirmed its support for Iraq: "The Palestinian people stand firmly by Iraq's side." The following day, Arafat sent a message to Saddam hailing Iraq's struggle against "American dictatorship" and describing Iraq as "the defender of the Arab nation, of Muslims and of free men everywhere" (Agence France-Presse, Feb. 26, 1991).

Arafat's enthusiasm for Hussein was undaunted by the outcome of the war. "I would like to take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the great pride that we take in the ties of fraternity and common destiny binding us," he said in November 1991. "Let us work together until we achieve victory and regain liberated Jerusalem" (Baghdad Republic of Iraq Radio Network, Nov. 16, 1991).

Leaders of Israel's peace movement expressed their disgust for the PLO's actions. One would need a gas mask to overcome the "toxic, repulsive stench" of the PLO's attitude toward Saddam Hussein, Yossi Sarid said (Ha'aretz, Aug. 17, 1990). Another activist, Yaron London, wrote in an open letter to the Palestinians in the territories: "This week you proved to me for many years I was a great fool. When you ask once again for my support for your 'legitimate rights,' you will discover that your shouts of encouragement to Saddam have clogged my ears" (Yediot Achronot, August 1990).

Simchat bat & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at some of the online resources for a brit milah. The birth of a girl or a boy is a wonderful simchah, but the two are marked by different religious observances. A boy will have a brit, perhaps preceded by the shalom zachar (welcome to the baby boy), a party held on the first Friday evening after the birth. [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/childrens/zachor/index.htm]

But what about the girls?

Traditionally, the baby girl is named on the next day that the Torah is read. The father is called to the Torah, special prayers and blessings are recited on behalf of the mother and the newborn baby. And at that point, the baby's name is formally announced. [http://www.emoil.com/girl.htm]

An essay at Circumcision.net suggests that there isn't a corresponding ceremony to the brit milah for girls because "the female gives expression to this spiritual covenant through a lifetime commitment to the Torah laws governing family purity... Moreover, all privileges connected to this covenant accrue to the girl from the moment she is born." [http://www.circumcision.net/FAQ.htm#Why isn't there a corresponding ceremony for girl?]

However, in recent years, many parents have felt a need to hold more elaborate ceremonies welcoming their Jewish daughters into the world. These baby-naming celebrations may be called brit bat, brit banot Yisrael, simchat bat or seder zeved habat, the Sephardi naming ritual for girls. For a very good overview of their evolution, take a look at B'nai Brith's Jewish Monthly Online "Thank Heaven for Little Girls: Finally, a Wholehearted Welcome for Half the Jewish People." [http://shlk.com/158]

The article suggests that "there are no prohibitions to prevent religiously observant parents from honouring the birth of a girl baby. Thus, this fledgling ceremony has taken its first tentative steps into Jewish households across the religious spectrum... Some read a loving note to their newborn or give her a gift of a kiddush cup or Shabbat candlesticks. David and Leslie Mirchin of Cambridge, Mass., taught those assembled at their simchat bat the Hebrew song El HaMaayan – to the fountain of water – in honour of their own new fountain of joy, Maayan Levy Mirchin."

Cantor Philip Sherman suggests that a celebration is appropriate any time before her first birthday. "Parents may wish to have a special gathering at a later date to afford the new mother and baby the opportunity to share in the celebration. On Shabbat, a Kiddush or luncheon may be held in the synagogue following services. In addition to the meal, the new parents may offer a few words describing their feelings about the birth of their daughter, perhaps including an explanation of the baby's Jewish name(s). No event such as this is complete without a d'var Torah, a brief exposition relating to the portion of the week or other relevant Jewish themes." [http://www.kolot.com/FS1999/girlborn.shtml]

Greg and Carolyn Priest-Dorman of Poughkeepsie, N.Y., wanted to create their own ceremony for the birth of Leora Rose. [http://www.cs.vassar.edu/~priestdo/ZevedHaBat.html] But instead of creating a brand new ceremony, they decided to adapt the Sephardi seder zeved habat (gift of a daughter), which "expressed the sense of joy and wonder we felt at being parents of a girl-child." They timed their celebration to coincide with the Birkat Halevanah, the blessing preceding the appearance of the new moon, which they "felt achieved the perfect balance of traditional Jewish ritual with the almost universal human equation of women and the cycles of the moon."

Tova Gabrielle Wilensky was born at 12:51 p.m. on Thursday, April 30, 1998, Israel's 50th birthday. A month later, her family celebrated Tova's arrival. [http://www.clarityconnect.com/webpages/wilensky/naming.htm] The ceremony concluded with the hopes that all Jewish parents could echo: "We dedicate our child to Torah, to a never-ending fascination with study and learning. With a book, she will never be alone. We dedicate our child to chupah, to never-ending growth as a human being capable of giving and receiving love. With a loving friend, she will never be alone. We dedicate our child to ma'asim tovim, to a never-ending concern for family and community, justice and charity. If she cares for others, she will never be alone."

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we read the Torah portions at this time of year, our minds ponder the various aspects of a journey. Avram, Sarai and their family begin a journey toward Israel and toward covenant. It is not a story of arrival, but the beginnings of an eternal journey taken in the presence of God. Avram and Sarai grow to become Avraham and Sarah and as promised, many nations grow from this family and their names endure even until today.

Each subsequent ancestral generation begins its personal journey toward land and toward covenant. Each stage shows us growth and development and each follows in the footsteps of those who came before but ventures out on its own, imprinting footsteps for those who will follow.

Yet each journey is fraught with danger. The Jerusalem Talmud states that in all journeys there is the presumption of mortal peril. There is a special prayer recited upon embarking on a journey which asks for divine protection and peaceful arrivals.

But spiritual journeys are equally challenging and we should likewise utter a prayer of supplication.

Every Jew since the time of Abraham and Sarah is born into their journey. Each one of us struggles to leave footsteps their children can follow and prays they can one day venture beyond. But we do not hope for an endless journey. In fact we pray for a safe arrival.

The portrait of our destination must be clear, otherwise we fail to recognize the markers along the way. Often the travelling is filled with missed opportunities because the traveller was too meek to boldly venture forth.

There is a beautiful midrash about a sage who travelled throughout Israel. Upon arriving at Mount Sinai, he heard a divine voice lamenting 'Woe is Me that I uttered an oath to send Israel into exile. Who will nullify it for Me?' When the other sages heard of this, they were dumbstruck. Not at the divine lament, but that the travelling sage did not immediately say, 'Your oath is nullified.' When we set out on our journeys, we can't afford to miss those opportunities God places in our paths.

Yet what is profoundly telling about this midrash is that accompanying the sage on his journey is an Arab – a member of a people who throughout history have been more an enemy than a neighbour.

Yet for an instant in time, they are travelling together, each appreciating the spiritual and physical elements of the journey. No strife, no war. At one point the Arab turns to the sage and asks "Would you like me to show you where the heaven and earth kiss?"

These days it's hard to imagine such a midrash. The journey is all too often filled with heartbreak. But sometimes it helps to glimpse an ancient text that provides a portrait of a destination.

A few weeks ago, I co-authored an article with Anna Morgan discussing our views of Jews who choose to express their disagreement with Israel's policies through actions (eg., anti-Israel boycotts etc.). One of the CJN's readers wrote a letter to the editor implying we were criticizing anyone who voiced disagreement with Israel's policies. Unfortunately, this was a misunderstanding of our article, which clearly stated that while we welcome differing opinions, we were critical of anti-Israel actions that followed subsequent to those opinions.

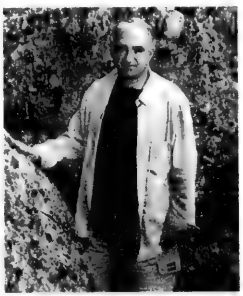
Jewish Toronto

Torontonian making a difference in Israel

In 1991, David Blank made aliyah and looking back at the move over a decade later, Toronto's loss was definitely Israel's gain.

Blank, 59, who made the move to Jerusalem with his wife, Gladys, and children, Robin, Mark, and Jeffrey, is the driving force behind Chelev Ha'aretz – The Best of the Land – a centre for Israel's vulnerable.

Chelev Ha'aretz is one of the organizations to which funds raised by UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 have been allocated. Established in the southern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Bak'a, the centre offers an essential service to at-risk children and the elderly by offering them a warm home and hot meals.



David Blank

The purpose of the centre is to make available a wide range of learning and leisure-time activities, offsetting the effects of poverty and broken homes, with the ultimate hope of keeping the children free from drugs and crime.

"The kids come here after school for a hot meal and programs designed to keep them off the streets, and to learn skills crucial to becoming responsible adults," says Blank.

The centre's daily soup kitchen supplies hot food for the elderly and disadvantaged, with Shabbat meals distributed on Fridays and special meals before Passover. The centre also conducts Passover seders every year.

With son Mark's help – he's in the computer business – the Blank family donated a fully equipped computer room to the centre while daughter Robin contributed a seder for 120 disadvantaged individuals.

"We also give them shoes, and make sure they have clean clothes on their back," adds Blank. "The way I look at it is, kids without shoes can't go to school."

A few years ago, with the help of Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert, the centre obtained a permanent residence. The building, located on Gideon Street in Bak'a, has been gradually renovated by the centre and its staff.

"If you had seen this neighbourhood 20 years ago, you wouldn't have recognized it compared to today," says Blank, a former member of UJA Federation's Board. "It was a slum back then."

The centre offers many workshops, a library and recreational games, as well as love and guidance supplied by the dedicated staff.

"Many of our staff members were once children here whom we took in off the streets," says Blank. "That's our goal – to show other children that there is hope for a brighter future, and that it is possible for them to be productive members of Israeli society."

The achievements of Chelev Ha'aretz were recently recognized when it was awarded a prize for education and social work by the Municipality of Jerusalem, the Organization of Community Centres, and other public bodies.

More importantly, its achievements can be measured by the hundreds of youth who have, through its efforts, successfully completed their high school matriculation exams and gone on to finish their compulsory army service, becoming an integral part of Israeli society.

Family funday

Feeling the need to do something "hands-on" to help Israel during its current difficult situation, Toronto's Sherri Baine found inspiration during a recent conversation with her mother-in-law Miriam, originally from South Africa.

"She was reminiscing about the bake sales and garage sales they held there, on behalf of Israel," says Baine. From that conversation, and with the High Holidays quickly approaching, came the idea for the Israel Family Funday held on Erev Yom Kippur, with proceeds designated for UJA Federation.

Joining forces with her sister-in-law Andrea Shugar-Herman, good friend Isaac Szpindel, cousin Marda Sperber, and plenty of youngsters, the Baine backyard on Lyonsgate Avenue was quickly transformed into a festival.

All in all, almost $700 was raised during the day for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. In fact, the impact of Israel's importance was not lost on Baine's youngest, 3-year-old Jacob.

"During all the fun, little Jacob came up to me and out of nowhere said; 'we're giving the money to Israel, right mommy? We are because it's very sad there right now.'"

"The kids were definitely a huge factor in this whole idea," says Baine. "We wanted to give the children a real sense of just how important Israel is to all of us as Jews in the Diaspora. We knew that our kids would bring plenty of other little ones out too."

Along with games and a raffle, the children also participated in letter writing and picture painting, with kids in Israel as recipients of their handiwork.

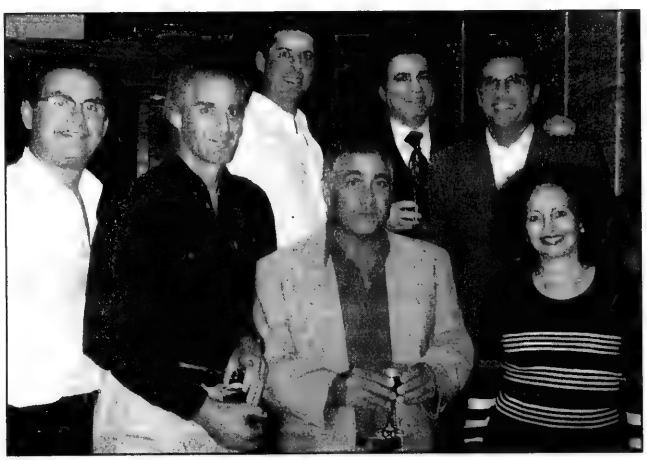
"The whole community really came together on Israel's behalf," adds Baine. "We hope to do it again next year, even bigger."

UJA mission paricipants reunite



Participants on UJA Federation's Prime Minister's Mission, held June 16 to 23, 2002 came together on October 2nd to reminisce about their trip.

The reunion, at the home of Allan and Hinda Silber, featured addresses by mission tour guides Mike Rubin and Ezra Eini, whose 22-year -old son, Moshe, an IDF captain, was killed by Palestinian terrorists in February.

The mission, chaired by Ronnie Appleby, Howard Sokolowski, Michael Buckstein and Stephen Goldhar, was one of 29 UJA solidarity missions to Israel in the past two years.

Jewish Toronto

Sharing the past Celebrating life

From October 11-14, Toronto's Regal Constellation Hotel will welcome an estimated 500 delegates to The annual International Child Survivors and Second-Generation Conference.

Toronto becomes only the second Canadian venue to host this event, which was held in Montreal in 1994, with 230 participants.

The Toronto conference, made possible with the assistance of UJA Federation, is called Sharing the Past and Celebrating Life, and will focus on Second Generations – the descendants of the Holocaust.

Conference highlights include a keynote address by Madam Justice Rosalie Abella, herself the child of survivors, and Dr. Robert Krell, the founder and presidentof the Vancouver Holocaust Centre, who will address a Sunday morning program.

"This conference is absolutely vital," says Bergstein. "When we grew up in Canada, after the war, few of us had any friends to whom we could relate our experiences. We were so anxious just to be Canadian and to move on. Here, even after 60 years, people come together with the same issues."

"For many years, many of us never even spoke about this to our families," adds Ekstein. "Now, people from all over can come together and understand others, and be understood themselves, without having to explain everything. It's a comfortable environment, where people feel safe and secure and can come to terms with many issues still unresolved – even after all this time."

Participants will be able to choose from an assortment of workshops that most closely deal with their specific areas of interest.

Workshop choices include:

- Where have all the Children Gone? – Child Survivors 60 Years Later
- Are We Struggling with Trust?
- Our Holocaust Legacy: Burden or Blessing?
- Marrying into a Holocaust Survivor's Family

"Every year we welcome first-time attendees who quickly become part of the 'family,'" adds Bergstein. "In fact, the name of our conference newsletter, Mishpacha, sums up the ambience of the conference."

Cori Donenfeld, an M.O.L. participant in 2001, at Auschwitz

On April 29th, 2003 nearly 200 Canadian Jewish high school students, half of whom are from Toronto, will be joining thousands of Jewish teens from around the world for an experience they're unlikely to forget.

On that date, March of the Living participants will walk the three kilometre distance separating Auschwitz and Birkenau, the largest concentration camp complex built by the Nazis.

The March of the Living is an international initiative, which is sponsored in Toronto by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

"We're moving forward in a positive fashion," says Toronto March Chair, Baila Lubek. "We're anticipating a large number of participants on this emmotional journey."

The 14-day trip, which leaves Canada on April 27 with a flight to Poland, culminates in Israel on May 7, where participants will celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, the State's 55th Independence Day.

> "It changed me as a person"

Marchers will have the unique opportunity to walk, side by side, with other teens, in silent tribute to the victims of the Holocaust and in memory of millions forced by the Nazis to cross Poland's terrain on the infamous "death marches."

"Just imagine," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, executive director of the BJE, "spending Yom Hashoah at Auschwitz and identifying with the rich history of Jewish life in pre-war Poland, complemented by the flush of Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel. No Jew can remain indifferent to that unique juxtaposition of history and celebration."

For March of The Living 2001 participants, Torontonians Jared Gordon and Cori Donenfeld, the experience was life changing.

"It was just unbelievable," says Gordon, 18. "I came back with a deeper sense of what it means to be a Jew, and really, for all things Jewish. I know it sounds clichéd, but it (the March) makes you want the world to be a better place. People were anxious to return home, but only so they could put everything they learned into practice," adds Gordon.

"It changed me as a person," says 20 year-old Donenfeld. "It was almost surreal, bringing out so many feelings and emotions about who I was as a Jew, feelings I didn't even know I had.

The March made me appreciate my friends and my family that much more – it made me appreciate life in general – even more."

Neo-Nazism called threat to German democracy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"They want to kill me," said Ingo Hasselbach, trying not to be melodramatic.

"It's still dangerous for me," he said in a recent interview. "I get a lot of threats. I move around a lot."

Hasselbach, 35, founded the National Alternative, the first neo-Nazi party in East Germany, the now-defunct Communist state.

When the German government banned the National Alternative in 1993, many of its members joined the National Democratic Party, the largest neo-Nazi party in reunified Germany today.

After leaving the movement and telling the German security services everything he knew about his former associates, he wrote a blistering memoir, Fuhrer Ex – the first insider's account of neo-Nazism.

Last month, he appeared at the Toronto International Film Festival to publicize the movie version of Fuhrer Ex, based loosely on his book.

He wrote it in conjunction with American journalist Tom Reiss, the son of a Holocaust survivor.

Since his departure from the neo-Nazi scene, Hasselbach, who is tall, blond, Hollywood handsome and soft-spoken, has campaigned vigorously against neo-Nazism so as to raise awareness of it.

"Neo Nazism is a danger to German democracy," he observed. "It's a dangerous movement for all of Europe."

And it may grow if the economy deteriorates, he added.

Ingo Hasselbach

In the late 1990s, Hasselbach founded Exit, an organization that helps ex-neo-Nazis rehabilitate themselves. Exit is supported financially by Stern, a mass-circulation magazine.

"About 200 people, including 10 leaders, have come to us," he said. "When you leave the movement, you leave everything in life."

"The neo-Nazi movement is a cult," he explained. "Those who leave are desperate and usually in danger. We try to help, educate and, when necessary, relocate. We also ask individuals to reflect on the consequences of their actions and to come to grips with a basic question: why do I hate?"

The average neo-Nazi, he noted, is from a dysfunctional household. Typically, the Neo-Nazi perception of Jews is based on myths. "They hate Jews, but have never met any."

Yet in Germany, anti-Semitism is anything but the preserve of neo-Nazis, he warned.

"It's such a normal thing, sometimes, for people to make jokes about Jews. And these are supposed to be regular, nice people."

Anti-Semitism, however, is not ingrained in German culture, he said. "No, this would be too much. It comes from stupid people."

Now a journalist who writes on social issues and radical right-wing politics for Tip, a Berlin magazine, he is no longer formally associated with Exit.

"It was time to move on with my life," said Hasselbach, who got married two years ago and lives somewhere in Germany.

He won't say where, because he is worried about his physical safety. "I don't want harm to come to my children."

Writing Fuhrer Ex, some of the proceeds of which he donated to children in the Third World, was a cathartic experience, Hasselbach said.

"It gave me a better understanding of myself."

Hasselbach was born in East Berlin, the son, ironically, of Communists. His father was a senior official who headed East Germany's state radio, while his mother was a journalist.

Israel's Spotlight on Culture

Israel's commitment to the arts – for every age at every level everywhere – places a world of culture at a visitor's fingertips. Orchestras, art galleries and theatres provide an added dimension to Israeli life from the smallest towns to the largest cities. Here is just a small taste of the cultural treats available.

Theatre in English – Israel's two most famous and historic theatres – Habima and Cameri, both in Tel Aviv – offer once-weekly English translations of performances. For more Cameri information, visit www.cameri.co.il/english.htm and for additional details on Habima's offerings, call 011-972-3-629-5555.

Israel Philharmonic Orchestra Celebrated musicians and conductors have transformed this orchestra, founded 66 years ago, into one of the world's best. Although based in Tel Aviv, the IPO performs all over Israel. Check out www.ipo.co.il.

New Israeli Opera – With historical roots extending back to 1926, the New Israeli Opera has established a strong following for its varied performances. You'll find detailed information at www.israel-opera.co.il.

Ticho House, Jerusalem – Anna Ticho was a beloved painter who settled, with her husband in what was then Palestine, nearly 100 years ago. Their house, which the couple bequeathed to the city, contains her collection of Jerusalem landscape paintings.

Museums – There's a museum in every corner of the country and, in big cities, on just about every block. Learn more about Israel's museum mania at www.ilmuseums.com.

For additional information about available missions to Israel and individual travel options, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office. Your presence will make a significant difference.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Hasselbach defected from neo-Nazi movement

A juvenile delinquent and rebel who left school to become a bricklayer, Hasselbach was a street brawler who painted swastikas in his neighbourhood. "I was already in trouble by the age of 13."

At 16, he was arrested for shouting, "The Berlin Wall must fall," and then re-arrested for giving a stiff-arm Nazi salute in public.

In prison, he learned the rudiments of Nazi ideology from hardened Nazi war criminals. "I became a neo-Nazi in jail."

With the collapse of East Germany, he acquired anti-Semitic literature from American and Canadian neo-Nazi propagandists such as Gary Lauck and Ernst Zundel.

Of Zundel, a former resident of Toronto, Hasselbach observed: "He is crazy and obsessive about Jews and the Holocaust. He's talking always about Jews. He uses Jewish material as toilet paper. He is sick in his mind."

Hasselbach said his own family was not anti-Semitic. "No one ever said a bad word about Jews. It was not a topic at home."

With Kuhnen's assistance, he established the National Alternative, which never had more than about 1,000 members.

"Kuhnen, for me, was a father figure. He took me seriously." (Kuhnen died of AIDS several years ago).

Hasselbach's father broke ties with him after he gravitated toward Nazism. "We reconciled about a year ago. It's getting better now."

Under Kuhnen's direction, Hasselbach plotted the assassination of Ignatz Bubis, a Jewish community's leader, and desecrated the grave of German-Jewish revolutionary Rosa Luxemburg.

Hasselbach met Bubis, a Holocaust survivor, after he abandoned the movement. From Bubis, Hasselbach discovered how horribly misguided he had been as a Holocaust denier.

Hasselbach said he turned his back on his comrades because he was revolted by a series of neo-Nazi firebombings of foreigners' hostels in eastern Germany. These racially-motivated acts of arson galvanized anti-Nazi sentiment in Germany.

At around the time of his disillusionment with neo-Nazism, he met Winfried Bonengel, a left-wing German filmmaker whose hard-hitting movies (Profession Neo-Nazi and We're Back) had a decided impact on Hasselbach's world view. After Hasselbach spurned neo-Nazism, his former comrades sent a powerful bomb to his mother's home. If it had exploded, it would have levelled her house.

Looking back on his career as a neo-Nazi, Hasselback can hardly believe he was once a fascist thug. "My past seems far away," he said. "It's difficult to understand how I could have been so blind."

Anti-Semitism permeates: scholar

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The current furor over Israel on American university campuses has degenerated into outright anti-Semitism, an academic claims.

"The debate about Israeli politics and policies has taken a turn toward classic themes of anti-Semitism," Laurie Zoloth, the director of San Francisco State University's Jewish studies program, said last week.

Zoloth was in Toronto to deliver the annual Harry Crowe Lecture at York University. Her topic was Anti-Semitism in Academia.

In an interview prior to her speech, Zoloth, a professor of social ethics and Jewish philosophy, said this debate is becoming dangerous.

"The very existence of a Jewish people defending the existence of a democratic Jewish state is put up for debate," she explained.

Zoloth urged critics of Israel to be careful.

"To oppose Israeli policy is one thing. To say that Jews are pariahs, or that Jews eat Palestinian children, or that Jews control the media, is to cross a serious line that separates serious discourse from radicalized hatreds."

Zoloth made it clear that these critiques of Israel take the form of verbal rather than physical assaults.

"But the verbal attacks are a disturbing sign of the loss of civility, and must be strongly protested."

She said she is concerned that on many campuses Israel is now regarded as "the moral equivalent to apartheid South Africa."

Turning to a related topic, Zoloth warned that the divestment campaign against Israel at many American universities smacks of anti-Semitism.

"Singling out Israel as a pariah, or calling Israel a racist, colonialist fascist state, is anti-Semitic in intent. It discriminates against Israel in particular, and sets up Israel as a pariah nation."

Zoloth said she agrees with recent comments by the president of Harvard University, Lawrence Summers, about Israel.

Last month, Summers – who is Jewish condemned what he described as growing anti-Semitism on his campus and elsewhere.

Summers said that the push for divestment, as well as actions by students to raise funds for groups with ties to terrorist organizations, are anti-Semitic in effect, if not in intent.

The divestment campaign in San Francisco, Zoloth observed, has become a popular cause in "the very active progressive community."

And at San Francisco State University, she reported, Israel is the object of considerable animosity.

"On our campus, Israel is verbally blamed, in posters and leaflets, as the reason why American foreign policy is reviled.

"Most Americans do not hate Jews or Israel, but on the campus, the question of Israel's legitimacy is very much in question."

New Holocaust program at OISE

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Anti-Semitism is still the hidden, polite racism of the middle and educated classes, says Carole Ann Reid, the co-chair of a new diploma program on Holocaust and genocide education at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE/UT) this year.

The University of Toronto program at OISE intends to address historical racist and anti-Semitic trends as they relate to the Holocaust and thereby highlight attitudes that promote ethnic hatred, Reid said.

It is hoped that the program, made possible by a donation by Albert Latner and family, will be the first stage of a broader Latner Institute for Holocaust and Genocide Education at OISE/UT.

It was felt that many students at OISE had no exposure to anything pertaining to the Holocaust and that this cycle of ignorance should not be perpetuated, said Reid, the former director of the Toronto Holocaust Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The program, a collaboration between the University of Toronto and the Toronto Holocaust Centre, also deals with the Armenian holocaust and the Rwandan genocide.

It is an indictment of our current education system that teachers can graduate from our universities without ever coming across the Holocaust, Reid said.

It is important that they learn about the problems of genocide so that they can better understand the roots of racism and ethnic hatred and more effectively teach about the "importance of creating a civil society that honours human rights."

Jewish teachers do not want to teach about the Holocaust because they feel they have a vested interest in the subject, and non-Jewish teachers are afraid to teach about it because they don't know the history and feel they may be overstepping their bounds, she said.

The graduate diploma requires students to complete four courses dealing with the social history of the period, the development of appropriate pedagogical frameworks and curricula, a comparative analysis of genocide thought and action as it "challenges the conscience of humankind" and the examination of Holocaust and genocide education though literature and film.

In a multicultural classroom, teachers have to be especially sensitive about how they discuss the pain of the Holocaust, Reid noted.

"We have children coming from countries where state-sponsored terror is a way of life," and teachers cannot get drawn into comparisons of the different types of atrocities experienced by their students and their families.

Instead, "we want our teachers to be aware of where these kids are coming from and help them deal with their issues by looking at another story."

Reid said her current class contains a mix of Jews, non-Jews, children of survivors and a child of a suspected perpetrator. As a non-Jew, Reid stressed the importance of having everyone educated about Holocaust history.

"The Holocaust didn't just take place in Jewish history. It took place in non-Jewish history, because the non-Jews were the anti-Semites who did the killing.

"We have as much to learn about the Holocaust in our past, and as much to claim," Reid said.

Scholarship winner melds variety of interests

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jason Rotstein admits to having been a bit nervous before his interview for this year's Dennis Waldman scholarship. But the 17-year-old relaxed when he saw what had been set out on the table the day he met with Waldman family members. There were coasters with pictures of authors.

Nell Waldman, in turn, told The CJN she was impressed by Rotstein's literary abilities, the breadth of his interests and his clear commitment to the Jewish community. The scholarship is given to students graduating from secondary school who intend to pursue university-level study and have a history of involvement in Jewish communal life.

A first-year liberal arts student at the University of Toronto, Rotstein did a summer internship at the Post city magazines (where he interviewed several authors), was a regular contributor to The CJN last year, and co-founded and co-edited a literary journal at CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto).

Among his other extra-curricular involvements, Rotstein volunteered this summer on the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's youth council, which oversees youth volunteer services, and has also done volunteer work with patients at the centre as well as writing for the Baycrest Bulletin.

Now that he has some solid writing experience, Rotstein, who has a particular interest in 19th- and 20th-century European literature, is thinking of working towards a master's degree in journalism and a PhD in philosophy.

"I think in the end I want to become a professor of philosophy or literature, and write on the side," he said.

Back when he was in Grade 8 at United Synagogue Day School, which he attended following Grade 6 at Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Rotstein's focus was on sports, not books, he recalled.

Jason Rotstein

"But you have to read when you get to high school, and I had a few good teachers," he said about his years at CHAT.

One of the books that originally sparked his interest was Catcher in the Rye by J.D. Salinger. "I liked what it had to say, and I was able to identify with the protagonist."

In his Jewish studies, Tanach tied in with Rotstein's interest in literature, he said. "I liked the stories and the analysis of the text."

Now Rotstein reads and writes every day. "I love writing," he said. Aside from new involvements at university – he is vice-president of Tzedek Hillel, a pledge at the Jewish fraternity AEPi, and is also doing literacy tutoring – Rotstein is spearheading the publication of Gam Yachad, a journal of fiction, non-fiction, poetry, photography and art he is co-ordinating as a youth response to the crisis in Israel. (E-mail gamyachad@yahoo.ca for more information.)

Rotstein's parents, both physicians, "always emphasized reading," he said.

Jewish Family & Child Service
Executive Director

Jewish Family and Child Service, a vibrant, multi-service agency, has provided child and family services to Toronto's Jewish community for more than 130 years. Recently it also expanded its services into York Region. A leader in the Jewish and the wider social services communities, the agency is recognized for its focus on prevention, community responsiveness, and innovation. It provides more than 30 different services, ranging from child and family counselling and child welfare, to rehabilitation and support, and financial assistance. After 22 years of outstanding service, the Executive Director is retiring. We seek a visionary leader to ensure that the agency's tradition of innovation continues.

Working in partnership with a committed Board of Directors and more than 100 talented staff, the Executive Director provides strategic leadership and carries full responsibility for managing the agency's $12 million operation. Maintaining strong relationships and partnerships with other community agencies, funders, and the Jewish community is vitally important in order to ensure that clients continue to be well served.

The ideal candidate has a graduate degree in human services and extensive experience as a senior executive, ideally within a human services organization. Excellent senior administrative skills, experience in successfully managing change, and experience in working with a board of directors, are necessary. Knowledge of a broad range of social services is important and experience in fundraising is an asset. Excellent interpersonal and communication skills, with the capacity to work effectively with a broad range of stakeholders, are required. Candidates must have strong and strategic leadership ability, with a commitment to the well being of individuals and families and an understanding of and a commitment to the Jewish community.

If you would like an opportunity to lead one of Canada's finest family and child serving agencies, please reply in confidence by mail to 2 St. Clair Ave. East, Suite 800, Toronto, Ontario M4T 2T5, by fax to 416-515-0003, or by E-mail to resumes@pmds-search.com

Rector asks Jews not to abandon Concordia

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Concordia University rector Frederick Lowy pleaded with the Jewish community not to withdraw its support because of the Sept. 9 "mini riot," with a reminder that its predecessor Sir George Williams University accepted Jewish students when other universities had quotas.

"It would be unfortunate and unfair if the Jewish community were to turn its back on a university that has given it so much," Lowy said in the keynote address at last week's FEDERATION CJA annual general meeting.

"Concordia's reputation, of course, has suffered and it hurts. It hurts especially to be vilified by Jewish organizations, the Jewish press, and from some synagogue pulpits, given [the] historic role of Concordia in educating the Jewish community and promoting Judaic studies."

Lowy recommended that the community tone down its rhetoric and instead dialogue with local Muslims.

"It would be unfortunate and unfair if strident voices were to succeed in further alienating the Jewish and Muslim communities in Montreal instead of advancing the much more difficult task of building bridges of understanding between them."

He announced a plan to send Hillel members to the West Bank and Gaza and members of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) into Israel to observe the impact of two years of strife. This, he said, was an idea proposed by Jewish and Arab students in a meeting held with the university administration and the Concordia Student Union (CSU) Sept. 27.

He said funding will be sought from the Jewish and Muslim communities and other sources.

Lowy hopes that most restrictions on Middle East-related activities on campus will be lifted in stages over the next few weeks, if students keep an agreement reached Sept. 27 that their activities will be based on mutual respect.

He defended this "cooling-off period" as necessary, "however unpopular it is with the activists and certain academics and journalists."

He said he believes the progress made toward reconciliation at the Sept. 27 meeting could not have been possible without the moratorium that was instituted after violent protests on Sept. 9 led to the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The agreement reached by the university, the CSU, Hillel and SPHR is that future activities will be non-violent, will not promote anti-Semitism, racism against Arabs or stereotyping, and will foster dialogue.

"We agreed that a test of these principles could be an event – debate, lecture, symposium – jointly planned by Hillel and SPHR. If the event goes well, a series of further such events can be planned and the restrictions of the cooling-off period can be lifted gradually," Lowy said.

He emphasized the importance of the larger communities setting an example for students.

"During the past century, the Jewish community has worked hard to build good relationships with Montreal's Christian communities and with francophone Québécois… The challenge now is to do the same work to secure good relationships with the Muslim community, which today, in Montreal generally as at Concordia, is larger than the Jewish community," he said.

He made clear he is not drawing "moral equivalency."

"We all know who were the aggressors and who were the victims [Sept. 9]. But many of you here also know full well that the matter is not so simple. Complex issues are never black and white."

Lowy added he strongly doubts there are 5,000 Muslims among a total of 29,000 students at Concordia, as has been reported.

"We do know that we have, this year, 289 international visa students from the Middle East. The majority of Muslim students at Concordia are Canadian-born or landed immigrants. It is also a myth that Concordia has recruited intensely in the Middle East."

Lowy said Concordia had plenty of security in place for Netanyahu's scheduled speech: 90 of its own security personnel; 80 Montreal police officers, including the riot squad; and 24 RCMP officers.

He said some "agitators" were not students, and three of the five people arrested are not enrolled at Concordia.

"The only people responsible for the violence were those who incited and committed the violence and those who planned in advance to prevent the scheduled speech from taking place," he stated. He said it is unacceptable to try to prevent someone with whom one disagrees from speaking.

Concordia security is trying to identify those caught on video cameras breaking the university's regulations. "A number of them seem not to be our students. Those who are will be disciplined once identified. I understand the police, who are also still reviewing films, intend to charge several [more] people," he said.

Lowy explained the factors that have contributed to the increasing radicalization of the CSU and militancy of pro-Palestinian students over the past four years.

"Concordia has the tradition of being the most open as well as the most diverse of Quebec's universities. That is perhaps why Concordia was apparently selected by the left-wing Canadian Federation of Students [CFS] for particular attention," he said.

Candidates supported by the CFS were democratically elected to the CSU four years ago by a small minority of eligible undergraduate voters and "essentially" the same students and former students, holding "a vigorous anarchist-Marxist ideology," continue to control the student government, he said. In a situation unique to Quebec, governing student groups can be legally certified as unions, as the CSU has done, giving it full control of its budget and the fees the university is obliged to collect for it, he said.

Holocaust series explores mother-child relationship

By CARLA S. SHORE
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — With his documentary series on how being a survivor of the Holocaust has affected mother-child relationships, Vancouver filmmaker Daniel Leipnik is breaking new ground.

Leipnik's 11-part series, My Mother, My Hero, documents how women who survived the Holocaust raised their children in a different way than other mothers did. It is Canada's largest Holocaust documentary series, as well as the first Jewish-themed program to be aired on the Shaw Multicultural Channel in British Columbia.

While there has been a lot of research done on the intergenerational effects of the Holocaust, Leipnik was surprised to learn that none of the children of survivors he spoke with had ever been asked to question their mother's parenting history in light of their experiences.

After interviewing 11 survivor mothers and their adult children in Canada, Australia and the United States, Leipnik found many common threads in their parenting experiences.

"In almost all the cases, while parents have told kids about their experiences in the Holocaust, they haven't talked about how it affected how the mother was as a parent," says Leipnik, 29. "In many cases, we're finding very heavy emotions. It's a topic people haven't thought to talk about.

"The kids recognize that their childhood was much more intense than what they saw in other kids. They had more to think about, more to handle, more to understand. Instead of having the luxury of being rebellious teens, they had to be conscious not to create any more anguish for their parents, which, of course, restricted their freedom."

The series airs Sundays from Sept. 22 to Dec. 29 on Shaw and Delta cable stations throughout the Lower Mainland. Leipnik has an international distributor and expects the series to air widely in the new year. He is also planning to package the footage into a feature-length documentary for next spring.

A native Australian, Leipnik moved to Vancouver five years ago and has worked successfully in film and video through his production company, Vibrance Alive Entertainment. Both his grandmothers are Holocaust survivors, and both are featured in episodes of the series.

One of his earliest memories of his maternal grandmother is being told how the family was killed in Auschwitz and Treblinka. He says doing this series with his family has given his parents a chance to talk with their parents in a way they had never done before. "It's been very liberating for both of them," he says.

When interviewing his paternal grandmother, Leipnik and his father learned for the first time that she had been a prisoner in Ravensbrook.

"My father has never been close to his mom," Leipnik says. "As a result of doing this project, they've been closer. In the show, he says, "I guess she is a hero, but he had never viewed her that way before."

With all 11 families featured in the series, Leipnik found a high level of resentment among the children of survivors.

"A lot of Jewish kids are brought up with overprotective, neurotic mothers, always concerned about how much they're eating, but this was all magnified with Holocaust survivors as parents," he says. "For example, the parents were fearful of non-Jews and strangers, experienced nightmares and insomnia, hid money in the basement, and were paranoid about darkness."

All immigrants have high hopes for their children, but the second generation of Holocaust survivors had emotional anxieties attached to this pressure, Leipnik says.

"The kids had to be the successful version of what their parents may have lost. Survivors have to be comfortable that what they lost is being regenerated. Their kids are their security policy for sanity."

While all this may seem like a terrible burden to grow up with, Leipnik has also seen a tremendous upside in being raised by a survivor.

"These kids have such intense passion, and that is one of the positive offshoots of being raised by Holocaust survivors," he notes. "Kids of survivors have this inner drive to be heroes, a driving momentum which says, 'I have to be a hero over every possible situation.' They've seen their parents be heroes over their own situations, so these kids have an incredible heroness about them.

"The average person doesn't hero over their own situation. These kids have such a drive to make every thing work. It's an incredible gift."

Shaw Multicultural Channel says it is proud to present this important series, and is open to other Jewish-themed programming. "We're looking for any kind of multicultural programming, and are always looking for more proposals that reflect the community," says Shaw's Karen Kilba.

Campaign '03 launched in Kitchener-Waterloo

WATERLOO, Ont. — Seasonal thunderstorm and heavy rains did not stop members of the Jewish community of Kitchener-Waterloo and Guelph from attending the 2003 United Jewish Appeal campaign launch at the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery in Waterloo.

Michael Soberman, director of Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) told the crowd of almost 100 people that over the past year, "the communities of Kitchener/Waterloo and Guelph have shown their support and commitment to our campaign and Israel Emergency campaign, and you should all be congratulated for that."

He addressed the need for small communities to support programs at home and abroad.

"Through this year's campaign we must continue to meet and overcome the challenges that face our local Jewish communities including anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment," he said.

The keynote speaker was Israeli tour guide Ezra Eini, whose youngest son, Moishe, was killed in an ambush last year while serving in the army.

Also speaking was United Israel Appeal's executive vice-president Maxyne Finkelstein, and community leader Stephen Kay.

Hamilton cantor retires

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — When Ruth Slater announced she was retiring after more than 20 years as cantor at Temple Anshe Sholom, a young girl from the congregation came up to her and said, "I've been listening to you sing all my life. What am I going to do now?"

Slater was touched. "I told her to call me when she was getting married, and I'd sing at her wedding."

"Singing at a wedding is one of the nicest things about being a cantor," Slater said. "It gives you such a warm, good feeling. In this work, you become part of a family's life cycle – you're at their baby namings, confirmations and weddings. Music is fulfilling, but it's also uplifting: I always feel better at the end of a service, and I hope people in the congregation feel better too."

Ruth Slater

Slater pursued her love of singing at a time when there were few opportunities for women. When she became a cantor, there was only one other woman cantor in Canada. In time, she helped found a group called Kol Nashim (the Voice of Women), made up of six women cantors with accompanists, who performed throughout the Golden Horseshoe.

Today, she says, there are only two cantorial colleges in North America, and while there are more women applying, Reform congregations offer them the only job openings.

Slater, whose maiden name was Seligman, was born in Toronto of immigrant Polish parents. Although they were from the same town of Rachov, the couple met and married in Canada. The family lived for a time above the sportswear and lingerie factory her father owned; later her parents ran a wholesale ladieswear enterprise.

Slater's father, whom she remembers for his wonderful sense of humour, used to travel a lot, and she recalled how he came home one weekend and told the family he had written them a song because he'd felt so lonesome. He sang it, impressing his family with his talent. Some time later, when they heard the same song on the radio, they realized they had fallen for one of his pranks.

Music and the arts were a feature of the Seligman family's life. Slater took piano lessons as a child, her sister studied ballet, and an uncle was a trumpeter in a Toronto orchestra.

Slater skipped two years in elementary school, and at the age of 12, went to Harbord Collegiate, where Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster were also students. Every year, the school put on a Gilbert and Sullivan show, and Slater was offered a place in the chorus.

"I always loved to sing, and would hum and sing all the time. I never thought anything of it," she recalled.

"My mother made sure I practised singing and piano every day," Slater said. "With my two aunts in tow, she came to all my recitals across the city, and took me to concerts at Massey Hall."

She went on to cantorial school in New York, and returned to Toronto to live after she married. Slater found work singing on weekends. She sang Shabbat services at Reform temples, and on Sundays, she was soloist at a number of churches. She earned $14 a week from her singing and supplemented her income with a series of other jobs that included working in a nursery school.

The couple lived in several big cities in the United States before heading back to Canada, where they first lived in Saskatchewan. They came to Hamilton in 1955. They had two children, and for some time, Slater continued to have a patchwork of singing jobs, including at Unitarian and Presbyterian church services, "which," she said, "are very different."

She was invited to be the first cantor at the Reform synagogue in St. Catharine's, Ont., and later became cantor at Temple Beth-El in Windsor.

Meanwhile, the family became members at Temple Anshe Sholom, and Slater joined the choir. One day, she got a phone call from the temple: the cantor was sick – could she fill in at a bar mitzvah? "And I never left," she chuckled.

There had always been an organ at Temple Anshe Sholom, and Slater began working with organist Tom Shilcock, whom she found easy to work with. He is not Jewish, but quickly learnt how to follow the prayer book, and was Slater's accompanist throughout her time at the temple.

Despite Slater's singing commitments, she found time in the 1970s to help bring professional opera to Hamilton.

"Festitalia [the annual Italian festival] brought in an opera company and orchestra from Italy, and a group of us asked, 'Why don't we have one of our own?'"

The Hamilton Opera Company was founded, and Slater found herself doing everything "except being artistic director. I had a great time and met some marvellous people I'm still friendly with," she said.

Although the company only lasted three years, it became the forerunner for the current Opera Hamilton.

Soon afterwards, the professional Hamilton theatre company Theatre Aquarius invited Slater to be their director of marketing and communications – a job she held for 15 years. "It was separate, with their own room and bathroom, and often they were glad they didn't have to stay in a hotel," she said.

Now retired, she is able to spend time with her family and grandchildren, who live in Vancouver.

Meanwhile, her second family at the temple are not letting her go easily. Slater was overwhelmed by the tribute weekend held in honour of her and Shilcock.

"I felt like a mezuzah," she said. "Everyone kept coming up and kissing me!"

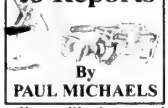
PA intimidation of journalists: an untold story

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

An important but under-reported story in the Middle East concerns the growing dissent, and the intimidation meant to stymie it, within the Palestinian leadership itself about Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat's disastrous rule.

Part of this neglect can be attributed to the greater drama of Israeli tanks and bulldozers confronting Arafat at his compound in Ramallah. That story is an easy, accessible one that sells readily, because it plays to the familiar image of Palestinians as beleaguered underdogs.

But another reason for the media's neglect of intra-Palestinian dissent surely rests with the reluctance of many journalists to break out from the "pack" pursuit of the familiar story to ferret out a new one that would require them to expose abuses by the Palestinian leadership that Arafat and company would prefer to keep hidden.

Even if Palestinian dissidents are unwilling to appear on camera or to be quoted directly for fear of retribution by elements of Arafat's security apparatus, journalists still have ways of getting this story out. Unless, that is, they fear either intimidation by the PA or being cut off from Palestinian sources that provide the grist for daily reports.

Paul Adams, in his report "Many in Arafat's own cabinet doubt he can enforce reforms" (Globe and Mail, Oct. 1), dealt with the growing voices of dissent within Arafat's ranks. Yet, the story about Palestinian intimidation of these voices remains to be told.

Khaled Abu Toameh is a highly respected Palestinian journalist working for the Jerusalem Post and Jerusalem Report. In the Post (Sept. 24), Toameh reported that a senior aide to Palestinian Legislative Council Speaker Ahmed Qurei threatened him repeatedly over an item that he had planned to file, one deemed unflattering to Qurei.

"Intimidation of journalists in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is not a new phenomenon, but not all choose to tell the story," writes Abu Toameh. Actually, very few ever venture to tell the story.

The "real danger" for journalists in the territories, Abu Tomaeh continues, "comes from attempts by certain elements of the PA to intimidate journalists who are only trying to carry out their jobs in a professional manner."

Abu Toameh writes that, "unfortunately, some PA officials (especially those who returned from Tunis and Lebanon), have almost no understanding of the real role of the media. As far as they are concerned, the Palestinian media should not be different from those in the Arab world, official organs for the rulers and their regimes."

In the meantime, prominent Palestinians – such as former PA cabinet minister Nabil Amr, who has publicly criticized Arafat's rejection of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's generous peace offer at Camp David, as well as rampant corruption in the PA and the continued resort to terrorism against Israelis – have been subjected to physical intimidation, allegedly at the hands of elements of Arafat's security apparatus.

The same treatment was even meted out to PLO executive committee member Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), who has been mooted as a prospective Palestinian prime minister to whom much of Arafat's authority would be divested. At the end of September, Abbas left for Jordan after threats against his life, threats that only recently appear to have been stayed.

thorities, the PUAH Institute (also named for a biblical midwife in Moses' time) was created.

In addition to providing halachic responses to curious couples, the institute has an educational function. It hosts conferences each year, with 1,300 attending the most recent gathering, and its rabbis lecture on issues associated with the new technologies.

PUAH also supervises fertility treatments– acting as a sort of fertility mashgiach – right from the earliest stages, to ensure that the mistake of 12 years ago is not duplicated.

"We need to know that the material given in is the material given out...We have to know that the child is Moshe's and Chaya's and doesn't come from somebody else's sperm and egg," Rabbi Weitzman said.

Beyond the medical and legal issues involved in reproduction, PUAH's rabbis are attuned to the human and emotional aspect. Being childless when all around you are having children is very difficult for couples, Rabbi Weitzman said.

"It's a big psychological burden, and if you alleviate it for a few minutes and you get a call two months later that they're pregnant, you feel you're part of it. You really feel you've helped people and that's what 'rabbanut' is about."

Vancouver Super Sunday set for Oct. 27

VANCOUVER — The Combined Jewish Appeal's Super Sunday Telethon, during which funds are raised for a wide range of projects here and abroad, will be held Oct. 27.

The goal of $4.5 million will make many more plans a reality, but for those organizing CJA, the notion of giving means donating not only money, but also time. Letting potential donors know that their volunteerism is a valuable resource is a stated goal this year, says Sondi Ritter, Jewish Federation of Greater Vanvouver president.

"Donations of time bring in new ideas, new energy, and different perspectives, truly valuable in an organization and a community this diverse."

Through one gift, donors can support social and educational services in Greater Vancouver and abroad – from hot lunches for seniors in Kiev and emergency aid for families in a newly impoverished Argentina, to local food banks and daycare centres. Planning is also underway to address the increasing concerns of housing and poverty in Greater Vancouver.

"We've been successful in trying to reorganize the campaign to make it more relevant to potential donors," says CJA vice-chair Jeffrey Goldberg. "Donations to CJA have a real effect on real people's lives."

Successful projects include sending children to camp who otherwise could not go, a job-match program for the unemployed, and providing companionship and meals for the elderly. Through the federation, CJA also welcomes the community to become involved in planning for more, and encouraging leadership in new areas, Goldberg says.

The federation's allocations planning committee makes recommendations as to how the funds raised through the CJA are distributed to constituent agencies. Last year, new priorities were placed on poverty relief (the current poverty level being recognized as 17 per cent) and on outreach, as the population spreads outwards in Greater Vancouver.

"Funds are allocated in a communal way, in a fair way, and with a transparent process," says Judy Oberlander, vice-president for community development and planning.

To volunteer to make calls at the telethon on Oct. 27, call 604-257-5100.

At least 13 killed, over 50 hurt in IDF Gaza raid

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At least 13 Palestinians were killed and dozens wounded when Israeli tanks backed by helicopters raided a Palestinian neighbourhood in the Gaza Strip early Monday morning, witnesses and hospital officials said.

Several hours later, troops fired into Nasser Hospital in Khan Yunis, where hundreds had gathered to learn about the fate of relatives, witnesses said. Four more people were wounded by army fire at the hospital.

Israeli security officials called the operation "very important" and "obligatory" in striking at a Hamas stronghold that Israel had refrained from attacking since the start of the latest intifadah.

After a missile was fired at a house viewed as a Hamas stronghold, troops were met by gunfire and a gunfight ensued. But as troops began pulling out several hours later, a helicopter fired a second missile close to a crowd of Palestinians who had left their shelters to return home, killing several people, witnesses said.

Brig.-Gen. Yisrael Ziv, head of the army's Gaza division, said the neighbourhood was a Hamas "nest of terror" and that an initial probe showed Israeli forces aimed only at armed men.

Palestinian Authority (PA) minister Saeb Erekat called the raid a massacre and called on the international community to protect Palestinians. He said the raid was timed to disrupt the Mideast visit of Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief.

Also on Monday, two people were reported killed and 10 injured in clashes between Palestinian police and Hamas gunmen in Gaza.

The PA accused Hamas of killing the head of its riot police in Gaza earlier in the day. Col. Rageh Abu Lehiya was shot dead by masked gunmen who attacked his car in Gaza City. Israel Radio said Lehiya was close to deposed PA security official Raji Jibali and had been accused by some of corruption.

Belgian prime minister apologizes

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt issued the country's first official apology Sunday for the complicity of government officials in deporting tens of thousands of Jews to Nazi death camps during the Holocaust.

Belgium deported about half of its 70,000 Jews.

In a ceremony commemorating the 60th anniversary of the first deportations from Belgium, Verhofstadt said his country must acknowledge those deeds and assume responsibility. "There were too many collaborators in Belgium. We should have the courage to say it, to acknowledge it and to bear it," he said.

He also paid homage to those who did not co-operate with the Nazis, such as municipal officials in Brussels who refused to force Jewish residents to wear yellow stars on their clothes.

Over the last few years, Belgium has signed a number of agreements to compensate Jews for property stolen during and after the Holocaust.

What You Should Know

- A New Permanent Resident Card: A more secure and durable proof of residency card for permanent residents (landed immigrants) living in Canada is one feature of Canada's new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act. This tamper-resistant card replaces the paper document (IMM 1000) for travel purposes.
- Who will need the new Permanent Resident Card: "Permanent residents" are people who have applied and been accepted to live in Canada. Permanent residents travelling outside of Canada as of December 31, 2003 will need this card to re-enter Canada. Canadian citizens do not need a Permanent Resident Card, and will not be issued this Card.
- Becoming Canadian: Permanent residents who can become Canadian citizens are encouraged to apply for their citizenship.
- When To Apply For Your Permanent Resident Card: Applications are now available. They will be processed based on the year you became a permanent resident of Canada. Check the chart below to see in which month you should apply. For example, if your year of landing as a permanent resident was 1998, you should submit your application in May 2003. There is no need to apply earlier.

YEAR OF LANDING	WHEN TO SUBMIT YOUR APPLICATION
2002	October 15 to November 30, 2002
2001	December to February 2003

Word Congress concerned by rising anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) is set to establish a new European Jewish Action Centre in Paris to combat the rising tide of continental anti-Semitism.

The proposed centre will serve as a think tank, provide an academic resource, write op-eds and serve as a counterweight to the rhetoric emanating from anti-Israel sources, including those on campuses, said Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"I think there's a recognition that there's a real need for work on campus," he said. "Students come without knowledge of history [of the Middle East] and this will prepare them to combat anti-Semitism and anti-Israel propaganda

Landy and CJC executive-director Jack Silverstone were among 100 delegates from 35 countries who attended last week's WJC executive meeting in Jerusalem. The two-day meeting touched on a number of topics, including the campaign against terror, security concerns, international law and Israel, and Jewish people and the clash of civilizations.

French legislator Pierre Lellouche, a deputy in the French parliament, told the WJC meeting that in recent years he has become worried that his children might be subject to anti-Semitic attacks in the street. While the number of anti-Semitic incidents has dropped recently, thanks to stepped-up policing and a more activist approach by the government, the threat remains.

The line between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism has been blurred, leading many to openly espouse anti-Jewish views, news reports quoted him as saying.

Landy said Lellouche's description of anti-Semitic incidents in France – attributed by him to some in the Muslim immigrant population – should lead Jews "to be vigilant about the kind of immigration permitted."

Landy said he briefed his colleagues on the state of anti-Semitism in Canada, focusing in particular on the murder of David Rosenzweig and the Concordia University incident that prevented former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking.

"I think we're certainly not facing the level of anti-Semitism the Europeans are. That doesn't mean the danger signs aren't there. They are," he said.

"We should be watching the signs that are happening in Europe and not think we can be isolated from it."

In other developments, WJC President Edgar Bronfman made an emotional appeal for funds to assist the Jewish community in Argentina. On a recent trip to Argentina, Bronfman donated $1 million (all figures US) and he asked the WJC members to participate in a new $2 million campaign for Argentine Jews.

"There are Jews in Argentina who are going hungry, who need urgent help," said Jack Silverstone, quoting Bronfman. "We made a promise that we would convey the message to our federations."

CCRA seizes then releases pro-Israel literature

as they may constitute obscenity or hate propaganda.'"

A day later, he received a voice message from a CCRA representative saying the box would be released. By Friday, however, he had not received the package.

Girn said the box clearly indicated it contained 350 copies of the newsletter, In Moral Defense of Israel. Although CCRA did not say why it choose to investigate the package, Girn said, "I think it's specifically related to the fact it's defending Israel. We have other pamphlets attacking health care and multiculturalism, and those haven't been stopped or questioned. So I don't know why these ones were.

"The only thing I can think of is that they're trying to be balanced during the investigation of terrorism and they have to investigate the other side as well."

The CCRA recently won a case against Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel, allowing it to proceed to revoke the group's status as a registered charity.

"You don't think in terms of customs stopping literature and articles," Brook said. "My first response was complete surprise that anyone in the Western world would be exposed to such complete censorship."

Bernie Farber, national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said he pored over the newsletters several times to determine what might have caught CCRA's attention, but could find nothing: "The pamphlet is perfectly banal in relation to hate literature," he said.

A call to the office of CCRA Minister Elinor Caplan was not returned by The CJN's deadline, but CCRA guidelines state that the importation of books, magazines and other literature can be prohibited if the material "advocates or promotes genocide or promotes hatred against an identifiable group."

Brook said his group's newsletter, which can be downloaded from the ARI's Web site (http://www.aynrand.org/israel/israel_sept_2002.pdf) supports Israel as a democratic state that protects individual rights and the right to private property.

The newsletter also refers to Israel as a Westernized state under attack "by terrorist organizations, theocracies, dictatorships and would-be dictators."

Brook suggested some might consider the ARI's arguments "radical… We say some people are the good guys, some are the bad guys. Today, to say that some are the good guys and bad guys, that some cultures are evil is not permitted in our multicultural, politically correct world."

Brook contrasted the seizure of the ARI newsletter with "the anti-Semitic, anti-Israel material available at any campus bookstore. [It] is really horrific. But it's consistent with the anti-Israel atmosphere prevalent on U.S. campuses, in Europe… and now maybe in Canada too."

Last year, it passed a law enabling properties that belonged to Jewish families to be returned to their owners. It also signed an agreement with the local Jewish community to pay 55 million euros in compensation for property that was stolen and can't be returned and for unclaimed insurance policies of Holocaust victims. And Holocaust survivors recently reached an agreement with the Belgian banks for a similar sum to cover bank deposits of Holocaust victims.

Verhofstadt's apology came about two months after a committee of historians set up by the government to investigate Belgian collaboration with the Nazis published its report.

Avi Becker, the secretary-general of the World Jewish Congress, said Sunday the apology was a direct result of the report, "which revealed to the Belgians that they were not innocent of collaboration or of taking Jewish property."

Becker, who was part of the talks over both the establishment of the committee and the compensation deals, added that Belgium had been slow to set up the committee and to publish its conclusions. He said he believes this is because half of Belgium's Jews were saved, thanks to many citizens who refused to collaborate with the Nazis.

"For this reason the Belgians had a very positive self-image and found it difficult to accept that they too had numerous collaborators," he said.

Oct. 1

• More than 75 per cent of northern Israeli Arabs want Israeli-Palestinian violence to end, according to a recent poll reported in the Jerusalem Post.

Oct. 2

• Security forces operating in Ramallah arrested Rakad Salem, the leader of the Arab Liberation Front, a pro-Iraqi group that gives money to families of suicide bombers.

Oct. 3

• The government announced it will not grant entry to any new foreign workers until at least the end of 2003. Deportation procedures against workers who never obtained visas are continuing. An estimated 250,000 foreign workers are in Israel, of whom some 150,000 are illegal.

Oct. 4

• Jerusalem police stormed the Temple Mount after dozens of Palestinian worshippers threw stones at the officers, stationed metres away from the Western Wall plaza, following prayers. Police used stun grenades and tear gas to disperse the Palestinians. According to Palestinian sources, there were some 5,000 worshippers on the Mount at the time.

• The Palestinian Authority (PA) is ready to impose security in Gaza to help end violence but first wants U.S. and Israeli guarantees its areas would not be attacked, Mahmoud Abbas said. Abbas (Abu Mazen), widely seen as a potential successor to PA President Yasser Arafat and a strong proponent of Palestinian reforms, made his remarks to the pan-Arab al-Hayat newspaper during a trip to Moscow.

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — An initiative seeking compensation for Jews forced to flee Arab lands during Israel's creation is gaining steam.

Justice for Jews From Arab Countries (JJAC) was launched last week to publicize the "historical truth" of Jewish refugees from Arab countries, said former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Richard Holbrooke.

The group says about 865,000 Jews had to flee Arab and Muslim lands because of hostility surrounding the the State of Israel's formation. That's more than the estimated 750,000 Palestinian refugees who fled or were expelled from Israel in the 1948 War of Independence.

Many of the Jewish refugees were stripped of their property when they fled.

The issue of Jewish refugees from Arab lands has been swept under the "Persian carpet," joked Holbrooke, an honorary chairman of the new group, along with Lord George Weidenfeld of Great Britain's House of Lords.

Also taking leadership roles are Canadian MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler and former Knesset speaker Shlomo Hillel, who helped some 100,000 Jews leave Iraq just after Israel's War of Independence.

The new group was created by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the American Sephardi Federation and the World Jewish Congress.

The coalition seeks "redress" for Jews displaced from Arab lands. Exactly what form that will take should be determined in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, the group says.

"If the Palestinians will be getting financial restitution, then we believe Jewish refugees will be getting financial restitution," said Stanley Urman, director of the Center for Middle East Peace and the JJAC's co-ordinator. "We want to make sure that every time the issue of refugees is discussed within the context of the Middle East peace process, then the rights of former Jewish refugees will also be addressed."

The group plans to collect claims from Jewish refugees, start a legal committee to document the claims, lobby heads of state and international bodies, mobilize Jewish communal support and back a public education project.

The new coalition comes five months after Israeli Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit said his ministry was preserving and computerizing more than 10,000 claims from previous compensation initiatives that had been abandoned.

The ministry has partnered with the Sephardi Federation, which has been publicizing the effort and seeking new claims.

The goal is to gather information on Jewish property in Arab states to counter Palestinian claims to lost property in future talks, Sheetrit said in June.

Most Jewish refugees from Arab lands went to Israel, which undertook a massive effort to absorb them. Today, they and their descendants comprise half of Israel's Jewish population.

In contrast, Arab states largely refused to settle Palestinian refugees, denying them citizenship and forcing them into squalid camps to keep the conflict with Israel alive.

Israeli and Jewish leaders believe any final deal with the Palestinians will include compensation for Palestinian refugees. But they reject allowing refugees and their descendants to return to Israel, seeing it as tantamount to Israel's demographic destruction.

But Palestinian leaders continue to insist on the "right of return." The issue was a key factor in the collapse of the July 2000 Camp David summit and subsequent peace talks.

The impetus for the new group, Urman said, is the prospect of future talks, the Justice Ministry push for documentation and the fact Jewish refugees with first-hand knowledge of their property claims in the Muslim world are dying off.

Until now, Jewish groups and individuals have crusaded for the cause with little support. Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents, said there has been no "vehicle for doing this on a sustained basis" and "the UN wasn't taking it up."

JJAC does plan to bring the matter to the UN, asking both UN delegations and Jewish groups with consultative status to broach the issue.

One basis for the group's diplomatic efforts will be UN Security Council Resolution 242, which since the 1967 Six-Day War has been the basis for land-for-peace talks. It also seeks to settle the refugee problem – without specifying which refugees.

The JJAC said it won't pursue a lawsuit against the Arab League, as proposed in June by Amram Attias, president of the International Committee of Jews From Arab Lands, which is part of the American Sephardi Federation.

"Our priority is to engage in political discussions," Urman said.

Attias said his group is still examining grounds for a suit, but said he would defer to the new coalition. "Right now, we want to talk in one voice," he said.

Taking action on Climate Change

Together, we can do it.

Canadians have met other environmental challenges:

Leaded Fuel
We took the lead out of gasoline to address public health concerns.

Protecting the ozone layer
Non-essential CFC consumption was reduced to nearly zero by 1996.

Recycling
Reduce. Reuse. Recycle. Canadians have turned to recycling to reduce the environmental impact of waste.

Taking action on climate change—it's everyone's responsibility. Canadians have met other environmental challenges, while preserving a strong economy. And by working together—all levels of government, as well as industry and individuals—we can meet this one too. When smallpox comes to town

By HASKELL NUSSBAUM
Special to The CJN

Last week, 36-year old Marjorie Pick, an Australian-born hematologist who works in Tel Aviv's Sourasky Medical Centre, was infected with smallpox.

The infection, which involved an active strain of the virus, is part of Israel's plan to ready itself for a possible biological attack by Iraq.

About 15,000 health care and security personnel will be vaccinated as a prelude to vaccinating the entire population with their antibodies – a process known as passive vaccination.

Health Ministry spokespeople explain that of the 15,000 active vaccinations, they hope for 12,000 viable units of blood from which to extract antibodies. As of the end of September, about 3,200 people had been vaccinated. The process is expected to be completed within a few weeks.

I sat with Pick in her small Jerusalem apartment shortly after her vaccination to ask her about her experience, her expectations and her fears.

Q. What's the procedure for getting vaccinated with smallpox?
A. They ask people to fill out a form, and we must write down if we've had any previous vaccinations of smallpox, or specific diseases and if we have any skin disorders, because apparently the virus can affect you if you've had any skin disorders. [The nurse said that] they're picking people who've been vaccinated before because if you've had it once then the booster will give you a better immunization. And because they want to use us to immunize the rest of the country, it means that our antibodies should be very high. [Booster shots for smallpox at birth expire after 10 years.]

Q. Is the virus injected into you?
A. No. They put a drop of the virus onto our skin, on the right arm, and they take a needle and insert it into our skin 16 times so that we bleed and the blood mixes with the virus. Then they put a patch on so that the blood and virus keep mixing and that's how it gets into our circulation.

Marjorie Pick

Q. How long does it take to incubate?
A. They say that we should start to produce an immuno-response in a week, then a disgusting scab will form and the bigger the scab the better. After that, we see a doctor, they take blood, and make sure that we had a good response and not too many side effects.

Q. What are the possible side effects?
A. Temperature, aches – a lot of bone ache, a one-in-a-quarter-million chance of meningitis, swelling, pain. It depends on each person's body or pain tolerance. The vaccine was uncomfortable, for me, for a few hours and then it was okay. But apparently it takes about 48 hours before any side effects would start.

Q. What do your parents think about all this?
A. They're so excited. I asked them to check when I first got the vaccine [as a child] and they were very cute; they took out my baby book, [from] six months to a year after I was born, and they were looking through photographs, and my first words – they went on a trip down memory lane. I think that my parents are the type of people who would say that [the authorities] are doing this out of protection and that there won't be any actual need for it.

Q. They don't think that a biological attack will actually occur?
A. No.

Q. Do you think that something will happen?
A. I think that there must be enough intelligence information for [the government] to spend millions and millions of dollars to vaccinate us. There must be enough of a fear [that something will happen].

Q. In the event of an attack, what will be your role?
A. I'm not really sure. Because I'm actively vaccinated, I'm assuming that they'll ask me to be a caregiver, because I'll be strong enough. The rest of the community will be only passively immunized – I don't know how good that immunization is.

Q. Do you feel safe? Are you scared?
A. I have to admit that before the vaccination I was nervous, partly because I thought that I wouldn't be allowed to be around people for almost two weeks and I thought how dangerous could this vaccine be? But [it turns out that] no one is allowed to touch the area of the vaccination, but otherwise it's okay. I'm not contagious.

Q. Did you volunteer for this?
A. Yes. They're only taking volunteers for the active vaccination.

Q. Do you think that the government is doing enough to prepare for a biological attack? Is the hospital where you work prepared for a smallpox attack?
A. I doubt it. I doubt that anyone is. Do you really know how to prepare for it before it ever happens? What I know is that if we're on high alert, then I have to be available.

Baton Rouge chooses the finest ingredients: crisp lettuces; ripe, ready tomatoes and peppers; the best of the day's catch; hand- selected prime beef. The chefs make dressings from scratch, and grill over fine hickory and aromatic hardwoods; watch them work in the open kitchens. They're finicky; each signature dish must be perfection: baby back ribs, chicken tenders light as air, raved- over dips. At well- spaced tables or tucked into intimate, oversized leather booths, the atmosphere is inviting: greenery and warm brick, burnished mahogany and brass, softly mirrored lamplight. Service is prompt and caring; you'll come back, bringing family and friends.

Sun.: Available for private functions.

The Palace Restaurant

722 Pape Ave. • 416-462-1166

Hours: Mon.-Sat. 11a.m.-1a.m.
Sunday 11a.m.-10p.m.

The Palace isn't just a restaurant, it's a symbol of Royal treatment. From the moment you enter until the moment you leave, your every culinary wish is fulfilled.

The feast starts with the appetizers, which offer more choice than some entire menus. It continues with Greek specialties such as Rack of Lamb, Moussaka, and Lamb Kleftiko. Fresh fish? Grilled Swordfish Steak with lemon and herbs; Whole Broiled Sea Bass; Atlantic Salmon Steak — whatever your selection, it will transport you to Greece on first bite. In freshness, preparation and authenticity, the Palace stands alone.

A private Party room for up to 100 people on the upper level is ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, holiday parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

Pan On The Danforth

Open Sun.-Thurs. 5p.m.-11p.m., Fri. & Sat. 5p.m.-12p.m.
Reservations recommended for Fri. & Sat.

A visit to Pan isn't just another meal, it's a sensory experience. Whimsical decor and fanciful Mediterranean cuisine give a year-round sense of summer, regardless of the season. A constantly updated menu offers new delights and ever-fresh interpretations. Consistently high quality has earned Pan the accolade of "one of the city's best" from Toronto Life magazine.

New must-try offerings like Pan Seared Grouper (delicacy incarnate with its thin strip of salmon, in a white wine cream reduction wrapped around asparagus and served with new mini potatoes and cherry tomatoes) join time-honoured classics like Char-Grilled Loin of Lamb with fig and orange glaze to make Pan's menu one of a kind. Enjoyed in a candle-lit yet vibrant atmosphere, they make the recently renovated Pan a magnet for good food lovers everywhere.

Deb Filler aims for the stomach again

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Deb Filler says she has always felt like an outsider because she's a Jewish female comedian from New Zealand whose father survived the Holocaust. But Filler is just like many Jewish women in one way: she has a love of food.

That facet of Jewish culture takes centre stage at Filler's one-woman show Filler Up!, running at the Artword Theatre in Toronto until Oct. 18. The two-hour performance features 27 characters exalting the joys of cuisine, from pineapple cheesecake to Chinese take-out. The native New Zealander contorts her body and voice to offer audiences multiple perspectives on culinary lust.

"Food has always been a big part of my life," Filler, who now resides in downtown Toronto, said. "I was born in a bakery, my mother loved food but hated it, and my German grandparents praised me for eating so much."

"He never wanted to waste a thing," she said.

Filler gives out pieces of challah to an audience who watch her bake it during the performance. The three-braided challah, she says, represents the three strands of personalities central to the show: the mother, father and daughter. With humour and sincerity, these characters explore the power and paradox of eating.

"How can we be happy with our food passion and our passion to be thin?" Filler said. "The play examines how we can't be happy holding onto that something that holds us back."

Filler's characters either obsess about food or body image, and sometimes both issues collide painfully. The father character mocks his family's overeating habits while the mother struggles to fight her cravings, the Long Island aunt solves all problems with Chinese food, and an ex-boyfriend remarks to a young Filler: "Baby, you'd be perfect if you lost 10 pounds."

Filler said people can identify with those food-obsessed personalities. She remembered one woman approaching her after a preview and saying, "That's me, that's my family, that's my life."

It's not surprising. Anyone with Jewish relatives will appreciate a Filler line such as, "Look at you, did you lose weight in da face?"

This show is one more notch on Filler's expanding belt that includes the 1993 hit Punch Me in the Stomach, which was subsequently made into a film. That one-woman show also featured Filler's seamless impersonations and theme of survival.

"I'm an observer," she said, "and I like to inhabit people's skins. I tend to become all those that I see everyday."

Having lived in Jewish communities from Auckland to New York and performed with theatre companies all over Europe, Filler has an extensive database of kvetchers and noshers to draw from. Her comedy shows send her travelling from Scotland to Israel.

Filler Up!, in fact, had been workshopped in cities such as Boston, Washington and Wellington, New Zealand, to rave reviews before making its North American premiere in Toronto.

To pay the bills, Filler also lends her talent to toys and cartoons. She is the voice of the Peg Bundy doll and "Mummy" in the animated series Bob and Margaret. She also plays guitar and has two punk cabaret bands, The Ratz and Debbie and the Dum Dums. Her rhythm skills shine onstage as she remixes songs to reflect Filler Up!'s theme. Beethoven's Ode to Joy and the children's song Teddy Bear's Picnic both get tasty makeovers.

In light of her father's Holocaust experiences, Filler, who says she's overly sensitive to the tragic events that haunted him, believes there is a serious side to being funny.

"I can't make fun of human suffering," she said, "especially as a child of a Holocaust survivor." She adds that her father's experience taught her how amazingly resilient humans can be facing darkness and despair.

"Laughter is a survival mechanism, and it's a way of coping with grief."

Filler said her mission in life is to create value, whether it be comedy or compassion. She said she never takes a day for granted and always appreciates doing what she loves for a living.

"And if I ever complain," she said, "well, then punch me in the stomach."

'Hello Muddah?, it's Allan Sherman'

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

Jewish-American screenwriter and director Rob Krausz, sits in the front row of an empty New Yorker Theatre, discussing his 10-year-old hit musical, Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh, premiering soon to an "embracing" Toronto audience. He's already eaten in three of the city's Hungarian restaurants, and can't boast enough about the politeness of Canadians.

"Casting directors, actors, investors, producers – everyone just does their job," he says.

Krausz, a seasoned television writer who earned a law degree at Duke University, but ditched it the morning of his first law gig, has come to town for more than schnitzel and civility, though. He's here to spread post-9/11 joy and laughter via the memory of a rotund kibitzer from the '60s, named Allan Sherman.

Referred to as the original Weird Al Yankovich (a popular, contemporary parodist) , Sherman was the first to parody popular folk songs like Harry Belafonte's Matilda (My Zelda); and Alouette, (Al 'N' Yetta), and he did so from an overtly, "culturally" Jewish perspective.

Sherman's short-lived career (1962-1966) produced 33 albums, including My Son The Nut, which yielded the Grammy Award-winning homesick-child-at-summer-camp plea, Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh, which Krausz says, is

Greenlight Project winner has strong Jewish content

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A few months ago, I received an invitation to a press screening of the film Stolen Summer. And although I wanted to attend, prior commitments made it difficult. As well, the late notification made it impossible to get a review into this paper in time for its opening.

The film opened in a few theatres in the Toronto area and played for about one week. Then it was gone.

But thanks to video, I recently had the opportunity to see the film at home. It is a must see for all those interested in Jewish film.

The screenplay won a contest run by Ben Affleck and Matt Damon – the Project Greenlight Contest. The prize for winning was a guarantee the film would be produced and distributed.

For first-time script writer and director Pete Jones, it was a wonderful opportunity that resulted in a very charming film.

The story is set in Chicago in 1976. Eight-year-old Pete O'Malley comes from a large Catholic home. His father is a firefighter who doesn't believe in a college education for his children and instead wants to set them up in secure jobs with the city.

Pete has been taught in school that the path to heaven is through faith and a belief in Jesus. And in order to ensure his own entry into paradise, he goes on a quest to convert someone to Christianity.

Because of his age, Pete's understanding of theology is somewhat immature and naive, and in his innocence he tries to help the seven-year-old son of the local rabbi to find his way to heaven. The result is often humorous and always enchanting.

Not only is Pete's understanding of theology limited, but he must overcome the obstacles placed in his path by the adult world around him.

While not a great film, Stolen Summer has enough charm and appeal to justify renting or purchasing a copy.

Stolen Summer is being distributed in Canada by Alliance Atlantis and should be available at most video stores. It is being released on both VHS and DVD.

ARTIST TUTZI SEGUIN PARTICIPATES IN STUDIO TOUR

Born in Romania 90 years ago, Tutzi Haspel Seguin is a little woman with a big smile and a bigger heart. Her life's passion has been shared between her family, her art and hundreds of students she has encouraged and befriended. A well-known personality in Toronto, she has held classes all over the city and in her home studio. Small groups of art lovers have printed, painted, sculpted and socialized at her studio. Home-baked refreshments and soft-spoken instruction are staples of her classes.

Seguin is a recipient of national and international awards. Her works hang in private and corporate collections. She has recently been the subject of a CBC video and had her own cable-TV show years ago. Writing a book of memoirs is a more recent project.

Seguin's beloved husband and daughters have passed away before her, yet she still continues to share her knowledge and paints constantly. After breaking her hip last year, she used her memories of gypsies to prepare a show that was hugely successful. The event took place just after she lost her husband, yet she came and opened the show to an audience of fans and buyers. The small colourful canvases just about sold out.

She is a participant in the fourth annual North York Visual Artists Studio Tour, Oct. 19 and 20, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Her studio at 43 Camberwell Ave. in the Eglinton-Bathurst area is a good spot to start a weekend of art. Twenty-five artists will join Seguin by opening their studios to the public. For information and a brochure, 416-638-2502.

Rodak Studio Tour: North York artist Jean Rodak also opens her home studio to the public as part of the North York Studio Tour and Sale, Oct. 19 and 20, noon to 6 p.m. Rodak's studio and exhibit remain open on Oct. 21 and the rest of the week by arrangement.

Yvette Tollar

Rodak's family came to Toronto to reunite her father with his sister, both Holocaust survivors separated for many years. Rodak has taught and encouraged children at the Koffler School of Fine Art. She paints impressionistic images and abstracts in bold, bright colours and various styles. The show, which includes pieces with Judaic motifs and Hebrew texts, is a retrospective of many years of experimenting with different methods of painting. 12 Maxwell St. (Bathurst-Sheppard area). 416-638-2502.

Winnipeg Author in Toronto: Historian and novelist Allan Levine is speaking here this week on his latest nonfiction book, Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits (McClelland and Stewart).

Reached in Winnipeg, Levine told Eye On Arts that he has produced a third detective novel, The Bolshevik's Revenge. The novel, which features Jewish sleuth Sam Klein in a story set around the Winnipeg general strike of 1919, is being published this month by Great Plains.

Levine's first detective novel, The Blood Libel, has reportedly been doing well in Germany. Published in German translation as Under A False Tongue by Goldmann, a subsidiary of Bertelsmann, it has reportedly sold more copies in Germany than in Canada. The company is preparing to publish a translation of Levine's second detective novel as well.

"In Germany they like Canadian stuff," Levine said. "From their point of view, the north end of Winnipeg is as exotic as anywhere else in the world."

As for Scattered Among the Peoples, Levine reported that the Outlook Press of New York is preparing an American edition to be published next year. He gives an illustrated lecture on the book at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Toronto, on Oct. 10, 7:30 p.m.

Paintings preserve the spirit of Toronto neighbourhoods

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

An exhibition of 23 watercolour paintings of street scenes and landscapes by Franklyn Glazier titled torontoUpCloseetc. will be held in the Upper Link Gallery at the Civic Garden Centre at Edwards Gardens, 777 Lawrence Ave. E. (Corner Lawrence Avenue and Leslie Street), Oct. 23 to Nov. 3.

Glazier, 68, a retired architect, says he is attracted to some older parts of the city and the spontaneous and mainly unaffected vitality associated with them.

"With limited budgets, they established a kind of zany, colourful ambience, with many varied establishments abutting and sometimes colliding with each other," says Glazier.

Glazier's nostalgic paintings are whimsical and lighthearted – realistic yet in caricature. "They make me smile," he says. "That's my measure of success."

Italian cafe on Baldwin Street.

There are familiar street scenes, paintings of the waterfront, the Beaches, Little Italy at College and Bathurst streets, Baldwin Street and other neighbourhoods where many Jewish immigrant families lived in the 1920s and '30s.

"Thus on Baldwin Street, you have the Italian cafe with Yiddish script on the front window of what was Mandel's creamery," Glazier says. "In Yiddish, it says butter, cheese, cream, eggs, fresh daily. And next to this Italian/Yiddish combo is a Japanese restaurant.

"The older areas tickle me. I respond to them – the character of the neighbourhoods. It's funky paintings of funky locales.

"Although I didn't set out to create an historical record of these areas, I do believe I've captured the spirit of the way they exist today which will serve as a record of the ambience and life in these areas which will not be with us for long."

He says that with "the inexorable beat of unrelenting development underway in many of these neighbourhoods, it is important that their spirit be preserved if only in two dimensions, for future reference and, alas, remorse."

Glazier was born in Toronto, attended Forest Hill Collegiate Institute and graduated from the University of Toronto's school of architecture in 1957. He worked on a wide variety of projects and retired five years ago.

Among his early painting experiences, Glazier says, was one in 1952, when he attended a sketching camp in Dorset, Ont. "I enjoyed it immensely."

With a busy career, he took a hiatus from his art until he retired, "and then I had time and my interest in painting was peaked again."

Krausz and co-conceiver, Douglas Bernstein's five-character, smash off-Broadway homage to Sherman, has enjoyed successful runs in Chicago, Los Angeles, and Boston prior to the start of its run in Toronto. The lively, family-friendly musical explores universal themes of birth, love, marriage, mid-life crisis, and, of course, food. A sort of Jewish bildungsroman, with an all-you-can-eat bent, set against the Laugh-In television show backdrop.

"The play follows the two main characters, Sarah and Barry Backman," Krausz says, "from birth till they go to the great Early Bird Special in the sky in Florida, but it's all told through the songs of Allan Sherman."

The wedding scene, replete with a band called Noah and the Nudnicks, sees an overzealous "Steve (Lawrence) and Edie (Gourmet)" set of parents act more concerned with showcasing the buffet and "schtick entertainment" than their child's nuptials, Krausz says. One of the characters asks, "Do you all see the completely edible statue of Golda Meir?" Fun. Jewish. But in Krausz' opinion, the show has a wider appeal.

"This is not a Jewish show; it's an Allan Sherman show," he says. "Yes, of course he was Jewish but Sherman was a parodist. Is Billy Crystal a Jewish comedian? Is Robert Klein a Jewish comedian? These are great comedians. Jews just happen to be great comedians."

But all great comedy comes from pain, Krausz says.

"People were homesick in the '60s," Krausz says. "People had problems with their in-laws, problems with their weight. Sherman was really able to touch all of those themes."

"The material is so embraceable," he says. "Funny words to a tune you know. It's a connection everybody can make."

The play runs at the New Yorker Theatre from Oct. 17 till Jan. 5, with a preview on Oct. 11. Tickets can be purchased from the box office, or from Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111 or online www.ticketmaster.ca.

Yad b'Yad helps Israeli girls at risk

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rachel Schwartz is a woman with a mission. She wants to rescue some of the estimated 15,000 young women in Israel who have been enticed into the world of drugs, alcohol and sex by their unscrupulous Israeli Arab boyfriends.

Schwartz recently founded an organization called Yad b'Yad, which has established a home in Beit Shemesh for these girls and wants to establish more, to be safe havens for them and to encourage them to finish their education and become productive members of society.

"Rachel Schwartz" is not her real name. It is the name she uses for public purposes, to prevent what she feels is the very real possiblity of retaliation against her and her family.

Like most Israelis, Schwartz, a teacher, speaker, mother of four and new grandmother, was not aware of the problem, she said in a recent interview here – until, on the way to Be'er Sheva one day, she picked up a 14-year-old hitchhiker.

The girl told Schwartz that when she was 10 years old, an employee of a nearby grocery store began giving her candy, something her very poor family could not provide, and meeting her secretly to talk and socialize. So charming was he that for two years she didn't go to school, so that she could be with him.

Then the blow struck. The board of education told her parents she had not been attending school. Terrified, she ran to her friend, who took her to his home. It was only then that she discovered that he was not Jewish, but was an Arab.

For three weeks, the girl told Schwartz, he treated her like a princess. He also began to give her drugs – free at first. Then he informed her that she would have to sell drugs and encourage others to use them.

She soon became the leader of a group of 135 girls, all involved in unsavory activities. She returned to her parents' home, offering to give them money if they let her live there without any restrictions. Desperately poor, they agreed.

Influenced by a Chabad rabbi she met, she decided to leave the life she had been living. The day she made that decision was the day she met Schwartz.

Skeptical about the girl's story, Schwartz took her to her home in Beit Shemesh. Under her direction, Schwartz went to the area of Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem that was the hangout for the girls and their Arab friends. She was appalled at the swarms of young people she found there – Israeli girls and Israeli Arab boys.

She discovered that the girls came from very poor or dysfunctional homes. Many had been abandoned by their families for being too difficult to handle, or, in the case of some from haredi homes, for fear that the girls would prevent shidduchim being made for their siblings.

There was no indication, at first, that these boys were not Jews, as they said they were, Schwartz said. They spoke perfect Hebrew.

Schwartz determined to do something about the situation.

She went to Rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu, the Shas minister of welfare for the Israeli government. Using some creative persuasion, she convinced him to provide matching funds for any she raised.

The home in Beit Shemesh has already been opened. In addition to creating a home for these girls, it provides social workers and psychologists, and programs, as Yad b'Yad's promotional brochure puts it, "to meet the emotional, social, spiritual and occupational needs of each individual girl."

But this home can only help a few people. A government report says that 30,000 young girls are at risk, Schwartz said.

She wants to create a whole village, where large numbers of girls can come and get schooling, employment and, especially, spiritual and emotional healing.

Schwartz was in Toronto recently to raise funds for her project. She is willing to come back to Canada to speak, to attend parlour meetings, to do whatever she can to make her dream come true.

Goldbloom named chair of Montreal health board

Victor Goldbloom, the new chairman of the Montreal regional health board, said he believes chronic care must not be overlooked in planning for the city's health care system.

"We absolutely must ensure that there is an adequate number of beds at long-term, convalescent and rehabilitation facilities," he said.

He noted that the two planned mega-hospitals, the McGill University Health Centre and the Centre Hospitalier de l'Université de Montréal, will both have fewer acute-care beds when they are completed than the total at the hospitals they will replace.

That will likely mean they will not give up many of their remaining acute-care spaces for chronic-care patients, as the hospitals they will replace do now, he said.

Goldbloom, who had been a member of the regional health board, was appointed chairman by the Quebec government after the resignation of Kathleen Weil. He will complete her three-year term, which ends in December, 2004.

The health board, usually referred to by its French name, the Régie, was restructured by Bill 28, which was passed last year. Most notably, the legislation created the new top position of president and executive-director, which is held by David Levine, who was briefly junior health minister earlier this year.

Under Bill 28, the role of chairman of the board, a volunteer position, has been reduced mainly to chairing board meetings and the public hearings the Régie holds once or twice a year, said Goldbloom, who was a provincial Liberal cabinet minister in the 1970s.

Caracas will no longer host Pan Am Maccabi Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Political turmoil in Venezuela has forced a change in venue for the 2003 Pan American Maccabi Games.

The Confederation of Latin American Countries, a unit of the Maccabi World Union, in conjunction with Maccabi Venezuela, recently decided to move the Games most likely to Chile, said Allen Gerskup, national athletic chair of Maccabi Canada.

Although a final decision on a new location has yet to be made, it's likely the re-scheduled Games will be held in Santiago, the Chilean capital, in December 2003, Gerskup said. The Caracas competition was moved because of the deteriorating security situation in the South American country.

"The situation is heating up... It's not getting better, it's getting worse," Gerskup said.

A recent U.S. State Department fact sheet indicated "'express kidnappings,' in which victims are seized in an attempt to get quick cash in exchange for their release, are increasing in Caracas," while "kidnapping of U.S. citizens and other foreign nationals, from homes, hotels, unauthorized taxis and the airport terminal is occurring on a regular basis."

Furthermore, the report stated, "political demonstrations occur regularly" while "increased violence, including exchanges of gunfire, has occurred at more recent demonstrations."

Organizers feared if the situation deteriorated further and they were forced to move the Games at the last minute, it might force cancellation of the Games outright

Organizers feared that if the situation deteriorated further and they were forced to move the Games at the last minute, it would throw all plans into disarray and might force cancellation of the Games outright. Instead, they decided to move the event with enough advance notice to give local Maccabi organizations enough time to plan for the new location, Gerskup said.

But the shift to December could change the plans of a number of athletes already chosen to the 200-delegate Maccabi Canada team.

"We could lose some people," Gerskup said. "On the other hand, we could gain some people who want to make it their vacation time."

The Canadian delegation consisted primarily of participants in team sports. Planners expect to send five basketball teams, including a masters squad (for those over 40), an open (adult) men's team, a junior boys' team (14-16 year-olds), a youth boys' team (17-19 year-olds) and an open girls' team.

A boys' youth baseball team along with two softball teams – masters and open men's – are also slated to go.

Three soccer teams, including a youth girls' team, a youth boys' team and an open men's team, are part of the Canadian contingent, as are athletes in 10-pin bowling, water polo, squash, swimming, half-marathon, gymnastics, judo, karate, beach volleyball, golf and bridge.

Altogether, the Games are expected to attract 2,500 athletes and officials, Gerskup said.

Israel shut out in Champions League play

CJN News Services

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Israeli league champion Maccabi Haifa dropped a 2-0 decision to German titlists Bayer Leverkusen in Champions League play last week, putting the team behind the eight ball in its bid for the second spot in Group F behind Manchester United.

Playing its "home game" in Nicosia, Cyprus, Maccabi Haifa could not beat Leverkusen's goalkeeper despite fielding three attacking players. The Israelis were also stymied when a penalty kick by Avishai Zano in the 44th minute hit the post. Zano then booted the rebound into the stands.

Two goals from Croatian Marko Babic in the 31st and 64th minutes spelled doom for Haifa, which struggled for most of the match.

Haifa was unable to reproduce the same intensity as they did in its 3-0 "home" win against Olympiakos Piraeus a week earlier in a game that was also played in Cyprus.

The Germans were more dangerous and held the majority of possession, but they lacked the finishing touch to put Maccabi away.

In the group standings, Bayer joined Olympiakos and Haifa with three points, six behind runaway leaders Man U.

"It wasn't an easy game at all; Maccabi played very well, but they looked a little tired," said Leverkusen coach Klaus Topmoeller.

"We created chances to score that we didn't manage to convert and we conceded two goals. That's the only difference between us and Bayer Leverkusen," said Haifa manager Yitzhak Shum.

Israeli soccer teams have been unable to host games in their home stadiums because of a ruling by UEFA, the European soccer federation. Concerns over security have meant that Israeli teams must play their home games abroad. Shum acknowledged that the travelling was taking its toll.

Haifa's next champions league games are on Oct. 23 versus Bayer Leverkusen in Germany, Oct. 29 against Manchester United at "home," and an away game on Nov. 13 versus Olympiakos.

In other developments, Israel's home qualifying match for the European (nation's) soccer championship against Cyprus on Oct.16 has been postponed until next April.

The match, due to be staged in Romania because of the security situation, will be played on April 30, 2003, the Israeli Football Association (IFA) said, quoting a decision taken by UEFA at an emergency meeting.

"The Israeli Football Association has greeted the decision with great satisfaction and thanks UEFA for taking a decision which is a victory for sport," the IFA said in a statement.

Prior to the UEFA announcement, the Romanian Soccer Federation said Romania would host the Israel-Cyprus contest, Israel's first home game in Group One qualifying for the 2004 tournament to be held in Portugal.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

It's my last year of high school and I am extremely stressed out, especially since I'm in the double cohort year. I get home every day and feel like I should be doing homework but I can't really focus. I get distracted very easily and upset over the smallest things. I find myself arguing with my parents, my friends, even my pet iguana, Jim. I don't know what to do with myself. Please help!

Stressed

Dear Stressed,

Relax! This is understandably a very stressful period in your life. What you need to do is to stop obsessing. You know, getting home and thinking you need to start doing huge amounts of work doesn't exactly put you in the best mood for studying. So, break up your evening. Study for half an hour and then do something you actually want to do for half an hour. Then you can go back to studying. You'll find alternating activities helps you clear your mind and stay focused. Doing different things should also help you become less distracted when you are actually working on your homework.

As for getting upset over small things – that happens to everyone when they're stressed. You should try talking to the people who are important to you – friends and family – as often as possible and explain to them how you are feeling. You'll find talking to them about whatever happens to be on your mind will make you realize that everyone might be feeling the same way (especially your friends), and that it will be easier if you can help each other through it.

Also, don't let getting into university next year overwhelm you. There are lots of other things that you can do if you don't get into your first choice school. My uncle Syd, the one who owns an appliance store, says the business world just doesn't get a fair shake these days. And don't dismiss taking time out to explore non-academic options.

I hope this helps. Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

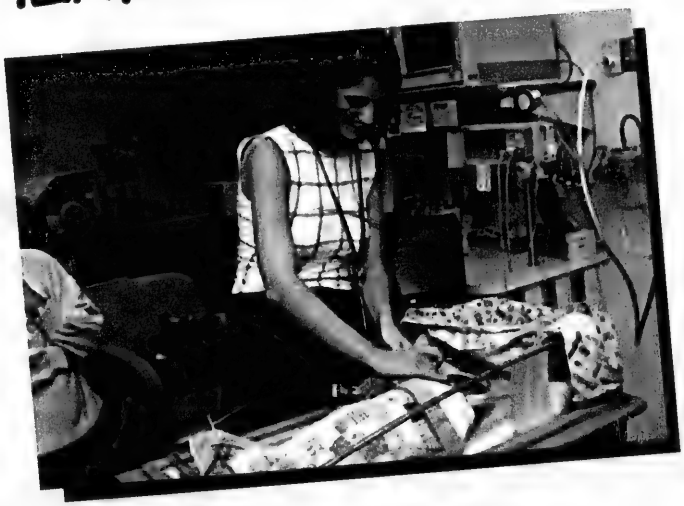
MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

NEW INFANT HEARING PROGRAM



Nurse Janice Manes performs the first official hearing test of the Province's Infant Hearing Program. Mount Sinai has been performing these tests for years so it is no surprise that Krista Riko, Director and Dr. Martyn Hyde, Assistant Director of Mount Sinai's Otologic Function Unit were instrumental in working with the Province to implement the program. Now every child in Ontario will have their hearing tested before they are discharged from the hospital.

The program is designed to provide the opportunity for all newborn babies to have their hearing screened. This program provides all babies with access to the Universal Hearing Screening process, which will be conducted before mother and baby are discharged from the hospital, or in the neonatal unit. In addition, babies that are identified as being at risk of hearing loss can receive follow-up monitoring at specific community clinics.

Town of Richmond Hill

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR
William F. Bell

On behalf of the members of Council of the Town of Richmond Hill, I am very pleased to offer my support for the 22nd Holocaust Education Week. The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation is to be commended for increasing public awareness of this tragic time in history through its presentation of a number of programs in schools, synagogues, libraries and churches throughout the Greater Toronto Area. In honouring the memory of the millions who suffered or perished during the Holocaust, we better ensure that evils of the past are never repeated.

Sincerely,

William F. Bell
Mayor

CITY OF MISSISSAUGA

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR

On behalf of the residents and members of Council of the City of Mississauga, I am pleased to express my support for the 22nd Holocaust Education Week. I commend UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for organizing an event that honours the millions of men, women and children who were lost to the Holocaust. Through education and awareness, we will not allow that chapter of history to repeat itself. Instead, we must all strive to ensure that racial harmony exists within our communities. By working together, we can build a foundation of tolerance and understanding where our children can grow as equals.

HAZEL McCALLION

W. Donald Cousens

On behalf of the town of Markham, I am honoured to show our support for the Annual Holocaust Education Week, coordinated by The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. In memory of all those who perished in the Holocaust, it is our duty to curb prejudice and racism by continuing to educate our children and raise public awareness to develop a deeper understanding of our responsibility for the future. With renewed resolve, let us strive to eliminate racial and religious discrimination from our communities and our lives.

Vaughan

York Region

On behalf of the City of Vaughan and members of Council, I wish to express my support and appreciation of the important work being done by The Holocaust Centre of Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to raise public awareness of the Holocaust. The numerous events being held in Vaughan during the 22nd Holocaust Education Week provide a valuable opportunity to reaffirm our community's commitment to the memory and lessons of the Holocaust.

Michael D. Brave

Fax 905 953-5102

On behalf of the Members of Council and Citizens of our community, I am pleased to express my support of the 22nd Holocaust Education Week. Your organization has shown, by its persistent efforts, a strong commitment in providing education in the continuing struggle against racism and discrimination of people today. I am confident that this event will be very successful in its endeavor to educate about this unspeakable atrocity, the power of the human spirit and the unforgettable message that this horror must never be allowed to happen again.

Proclamation

Holocaust Education Week

October 30 - November 11, 2002

WHEREAS this 22nd annual Holocaust Education Week allows us time to reflect on the atrocities of the past and to honour the memory of the millions of men, women and children who perished or suffered during the Holocaust; and

WHEREAS it is essential that we educate our children to learn the lessons of the past through programs and initiatives in synagogues, schools, libraries and churches throughout our communities, to help them develop a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future; and

WHEREAS these unimaginable horrors must never be repeated. We must work to ensure that our communities exist in racial harmony and only through remembrance, education and understanding of the Holocaust can public awareness be heightened, and religious discrimination, racism and prejudice eliminated.

NOW THEREFORE I, Mayor Mel Lastman, on behalf of Toronto City Council and the 2.5 million people of our great City, do hereby proclaim October 30 - November 11, 2002 as "Holocaust Education Week" to recognize and applaud the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation on its tireless efforts to ensure that this horrendous time in history is never forgotten.

Mel Lastman

It is my great pleasure to invite you to participate in the 22nd annual Holocaust Education Week. This event is the largest and highest profile initiative of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto each year, and a wide array of programs is again being offered to afford you the opportunity to explore and examine many different aspects of the Holocaust.

The mandate of the Holocaust Centre is to promote Holocaust education and remembrance. This is achieved in many ways, of which Holocaust Education Week is one. We host 30,000 visitors annually at the Centre, and arrange a number of events during the year, including outreach to the community at large. A highlight of 2002 was the opening of our Survivor Speaker Photographic Exhibit, a tribute to our most treasured resource at the Centre, our survivor speakers. Not only will the exhibit ensure that our survivor speakers will always be remembered, but the photographs and attached storyboards have considerable interest and educational value for visitors to the Centre.

As well, the Centre was a proud co-sponsor in October of the International Child Survivors and Second Generation Conference, held in Toronto. This annual event provides a forum for child survivors, their spouses and children, and all descendants of the Holocaust to share in their past, rejoice in their survival, deal with the issues facing them, and pass on their stories to future generations.

2002 also marked the first year of operations of the Latner Program for Holocaust and Genocide Studies, a joint endeavour between the Centre and OISE/University of Toronto. The purpose of this diploma program is to provide instruction as to how the Holocaust should be taught to students, a subject which we consider to be of the utmost importance.

The Holocaust Centre is a hive of activity and you are invited to visit and participate in the many events which take place annually. It is only through remembrance and education that we can ensure the memory of those lost and learn the lessons of the Holocaust. Racism, bigotry, Holocaust denial and prejudice are sadly part of our landscape today, and can only be eliminated by continued education and discussion.

I would like to congratulate and thank Barbara Rusch and her diligent committee for their passion and commitment in providing a superb roster of events for Holocaust Education Week. I do hope that you will avail yourselves of the opportunity to participate in as many of the programs as possible.

ISRAEL EMERGENCY CAMPAIGN 2003

Once again, our community manifests its commitment to remember and teach the lessons of the Shoah. The recent horrific and traumatic conditions in Israel and the negative experience of Jews around the world reinforce the need to remember and learn from the past. Many thought the challenges of anti-Semitism had been largely met and had begun to recede as a threat. However, the convergence of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic behaviour, as witnessed in the rhetoric and violence here at home and abroad, teaches us otherwise.

Today's circumstance underscores the need to learn from the past and confront the dangers of the present. With this reality, the relevance and importance of Holocaust education cannot be overstated. The resurgence of anti-Semitism and the hateful anti-Israel propaganda must be met with renewed determination to remember, to teach and to act to safeguard our community.

With best wishes for a successful Holocaust Education Week.

Sincerely,

Ralph Shedletsky, PhD

22nd Annual Holocaust Education Week

There are many different kinds of memorials. Some are inscribed with names and dates; others are built of materials intended to endure for centuries; while still others are as fragile and ephemeral as the souls they commemorate. Whether in the likeness of a valiant hero carved in granite, or in the form of an imposing building, a wall of memory or a perishable flower garden, all memorials require constant care, attention and replenishing. But perhaps the most significant are built on the memories, the words and the intensely personal stories of those who survived, as well as those who study, write about and recreate the events of the past for the benefit of those who never experienced them.

Holocaust Education Week, though not permanent or immutable in a physical sense, has in its own way become as substantial and sustaining a memorial as any built of steel or concrete. Now in its 22nd year, it has expanded and evolved, constantly replenishing itself and still dedicated to searching for a renewed sense of understanding for the tragic events which took six million Jewish lives and changed countless others. It is our continued pledge to honour their memory, remember their courage and perpetuate their voices.

This year our programs, over 100 in all over a two-week period, include musical tributes and dramatic presentations, films, exhibits and other cultural events, lectures with an academic or historical perspective, in addition to remarkable accounts of terror and survival. They take place in synagogues, churches, libraries, book stores, schools and community centres throughout the Toronto area, and will include something for every interest and age group. Once again we invite you to participate in an extraordinary program of remembrance and commemoration.

I would like to thank Howard Driman for his invaluable assistance and encouragement, and the members of my committee for their outstanding commitment and enthusiasm. We would also like to express our appreciation to all the participating organizations for their generosity of time and resources. A special debt of gratitude is due to Mary Siklos and the staff of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

THE CHRISTIAN-JEWISH DIALOGUE OF TORONTO

2 Carlton Street
Suite 800
Toronto, Ont
M5B 1J3
(416) 598-4242

It is the privilege and the responsibility of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, through its Holocaust Remembrance Committee, to coordinate the participation of Christian churches during Holocaust Education Week.

For this year's Main Event, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto decided to go back to the primary authorities on the Holocaust, the survivors themselves. For Christians who may not have had much exposure to the reality or even a history of the Holocaust, the experience of meeting survivors face-to-face, hearing their stories, asking them questions and sharing their memories can be both profoundly moving and enlightening. So we are especially grateful this year to the survivors who have graciously agreed to participate in our program on Sunday, November 3. You will find more information about the program in this brochure on page 4.

We commend our participating churches for continuing to support this educational effort, and we thank The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation for not only inviting our participation, but also for its active support and cooperation.

HANA'S SUITCASE

Hana and George Brady – November 25, 1941

In March 2000, a suitcase arrived at the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre. On the outside, in white paint, were the words Hana Brady, May 16, 1931 – Waisenkind, the German word for "orphan". Japanese children were full of questions: Who was Hana? What sort of girl was she? What happened to her? The curator of the centre, Fumiko Ishioka, was determined to find the answers. Her relentless search across Europe led her ultimately to Toronto and to George Brady, the surviving brother of Hana Brady.

KAREN LEVINE will introduce her Peabody Award-winning radio documentary Hana's Suitcase, based on this remarkable story that has attracted worldwide attention, and will discuss the writing of her current best-selling book of the same name. Ms. Levine will be available to sign her book.

MICHAEL ENRIGHT, well-known CBC personality, will moderate the program which features GEORGE BRADY, who will describe his visit to Japan and how the appearance of Hana's suitcase in Tokyo has changed his life. FUMIKO ISHIOKA will describe her work in Japan to promote Holocaust education, and the impact that the appearance of Hana's suitcase has had on this work.

This program is generously co-sponsored by the Abraham and Ida Moncik Memorial Fund for Holocaust Education.

"THE SHOAH AND THE VATICAN – A VERY UNCOMFORTABLE PAST"

The often-heated debate about the Vatican's role in facilitating the Holocaust has focused on the issue of Pius XII's "silence" during World War II. Much more important, however, is the largely ignored question of the role played by the Vatican in the decades leading up to the Holocaust in fomenting hatred of the Jews. In reaction to DAVID KERTZER's 2001 book, The Popes Against the Jews: The Vatican's Role in the Rise of Modern Anti-Semitism, the Church has responded with a variety of denials and denunciations. Kertzer will address these attacks and show how involved the Vatican was in the demonization of the Jews before the Second World War. The author will be available to sign copies of his book.

"MESSAGE TO YOUTH: YOUR BRAIN IS YOUR BEST WEAPON"

Rarely does a man who has lived such an exceptional life possess a passion for teaching and motivating young people. Born in Palestine in 1929, PETER Z. MALKIN was a secret agent with the Mossad for 27 years. He offers two unique perspectives: a compelling story as the secret agent who physically captured Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, and insights from a life guided by discipline and ethics in a profession that is a mystery to most. The central tenets of his message are to counter the violence so prevalent in present-day culture, and to use the brain as one's most effective weapon to solve the real conflicts children face in today's society, not the artificial ones glamorized by television, video games and the cinema. "ANGRY HARVEST"

Nominated for an Academy Award for Best Foreign Film, Angry Harvest tells the riveting, yet disturbing, story of a Polish farmer who harbours a young Jewish woman during World War II. The farmer risks his life by taking her in, but feels, as a good Christian, he must. The film delves into the darker side of human behaviour as the differences in their education, religion, philosophy and age cause the farmer and the woman to detest each other. The film marks the directing debut of Agnieszka Holland (Europa, Europa). Armin Mueller-Stahl won Best Actor Award at the Montreal Film Festival for his role as the farmer. Co-sponsored by the Goethe Institut. Tickets: $8 (available 15 minutes prior to the screening). For more information, call 416-924-6211.

"EICHMANN IN MY HANDS"

PETER Z. MALKIN is an Israeli intelligence legend. In his 27 years in the Mossad, ultimately as Chief of Operations, he took a lead role in Israel's most celebrated intelligence coups and covert operations, and was twice awarded the Prime Minister's Medal, Israel's highest honour. But even had he done nothing else, his place in history would be secure because of his action on May 11, 1960, the night he physically captured Adolph Eichmann, the most hunted of Nazi war criminals, with an elite commando team in Argentina. Malkin will describe his remarkable life and particularly the mission which led to Eichmann's being brought to justice. He will be available to sign his book.

"MIRRORING EVIL – NAZI IMAGERY"

NORMAN KLEEBLATT, the Susan and Elihu Rose Curator of Fine Arts at The Jewish Museum, New York, will discuss this recent exhibition. The show includes the work of 13 internationally recognized young artists who have departed from traditional ways of addressing the Holocaust. About his research he wrote, "I began to notice a new generation of artists who look at these events (related to the Holocaust) in a radically different – indeed disturbing – way. They created works in which viewers encounter the perpetrators face-to-face in scenarios in which ethical and moral issues cannot be easily resolved." With the use of slides, Kleeblatt will highlight the work of several of these artists and discuss the debates and controversies that began when the show opened.

"DISPLACED PERSONS: GROWING UP AMERICAN AFTER THE HOLOCAUST"

As a child of Holocaust survivors, JOSEPH BERGER emigrated to New York City in 1950. In his poignant memoir, Displaced Persons, described by Elie Wiesel as "powerful, brilliantly written and a remarkable tribute not only to his parents but to an entire generation of Holocaust survivors," Berger documents a difficult coming of age, torn between the painful memories and unimaginable losses of his parents and the life of promise and opportunity he carves out for himself in the new world. In many ways, this is not just his own story, but the compelling tale of thousands of second generation Holocaust survivors, told with honesty and humour. Berger is deputy editor of The New York Times, former bureau chief and a veteran reporter for that newspaper on religion and education.

"TEACHING THE HOLOCAUST AND GENOCIDE: HOW HATRED HAPPENS"

If you cannot see how hatred is taught, how can you understand how hatred happens? One of the cornerstones of the Pollock Collection, a wide array of Holocaust materials housed at Centennial College, is The Poisonous Mushroom (Der Giftpilz). This virulent piece of anti-Semitic propaganda was taught in German schools in order to prepare students for genocide. Today, teachers realize that understanding the evolution of racial and ethnic hatred through the study of propaganda is one means of preparing students for genocide awareness. How, then, do good teachers effectively integrate such inherently offensive, yet deeply instructive, historical materials into their lessons? LEO KABALISA, a Tutsi survivor of the Rwandan genocide of 1994, will discuss how his experiences have shaped his teaching at Yorkhill Elementary School. His talk will be followed by an open discussion led by a panel of educators representing all levels. Selected materials from the Pollock Collection, including Der Giftpilz, will be displayed. Recommended for educators at all levels.

"DEDICATION OF MEGILLAT HASHOAH: THE SCROLL OF THE HOLOCAUST"

A campaign, based at Beth David Congregation, and extending through the Toronto community and beyond, headed by Alex Eisen and Rabbi Philip Scheim, led to the creation of Megillat HaShoah in Jerusalem. The Scroll of the Holocaust, a liturgy for synagogues and communities for Yom HaShoah, was the result of a years-long vision and pursuit by Eisen. This coming Yom HaShoah, the Megillah HaShoah will be read in congregations world-wide.

In attendance at the dedication will be RABBI REUVEN HAMMER of Jerusalem, author of Entering Jewish Prayer and Entering the High Holy Days, and President, Rabbinical Assembly; RABBI DAVID GOLINKIN of Jerusalem, author of The Status of Women in Jewish Law and President, Schechter Institute; RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM, CANTOR MARSHALL LOOMER and members of the Toronto Rabbinic and Cantorial Community.

The program is free but tickets are required. Call 416-633-5500.

"JAKOB THE LIAR"

Trapped in a Polish ghetto with thousands of other Jews facing starvation or deportation, Jakob is detained one evening at Gestapo headquarters. Eavesdropping, he overhears a radio report about a nearby Russian victory. He passes on the information in the camp and then feigns access to a hidden radio. By keeping up the façade, he becomes a one-man bulwark against despair, a reluctant hero and a tragic figure, a man ultimately powerless to change the fate of his people. FRANK BEYER is the celebrated filmmaker from the former GDR and creator of the original film Jakob the Liar (Jakob Der Luegner), a literary adaptation of Jurek Becker's famous novel. After the screening (with English subtitles), he will discuss his 1974 film, which served as a basis for the Hollywood version starring Robin Williams. Admission: $5. Age: 18+. Seating capacity: 80.

COMMUNITY COMMEMORATION OF KRISTALLNACHT

"ECHOES OF KRISTALLNACHT IN OUR TIME"

PROFESSOR IRWIN COTLER, O.C. is a Member of Parliament for Mount Royal in Montreal. He is internationally renowned for his tireless efforts in promoting human rights, having represented such famous prisoners of conscience as Natan Scharansky, Nelson Mandela, Andrei Sakharov and Jacobo Timmerman. For many years, he has worked on behalf of peace in the Middle East. He is a long-time advocate in the world-wide struggle against racism and discrimination, and has chaired or served on many international Commissions of Inquiry.

Professor Cotler will review the events leading to Kristallnacht and compare these with what he observes around the world today.

This program will commemorate the 64th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, when, on November 9-10, 1938, a massive, coordinated attack was carried out against Jews throughout Germany and Austria. Hundreds were killed or injured, synagogues burned, businesses destroyed, cemeteries and schools vandalized and thousands of Jews arrested and sent to concentration camps.

"COME OUT FIGHTING, THE 761ST"

This documentary tells the story of a segregated tank battalion of African-American soldiers who fought in World War II under the command of General George Patton. They were responsible for helping the Allies defeat the Germans in the Battle of the Bulge and were credited with liberating several concentration camps in Austria. Because of their courage and determination, President Harry Truman desegregated the American military in 1948. Produced by Fern Levitt. MAX EISEN is a Slovakian Jew who was liberated by the 80th U.S. Infantry (also a segregated unit) in Ebensee on May 6, 1945. Following the screening, he will recount the details of his liberation.

"ETERNAL VIGILANCE"

The mass murder of our people and the evil perpetrated by many of their neighbours has traumatized the Jewish people, creating hesitancy within many to trust others. Yet it is important that we ask: "Were there any positive messages that we learned from the Holocaust? Have we, as a people and individuals, lived up to our own commitment of being eternally vigilant to the ills of others?" A panel including AVRUM ROSENZWEIG, Director of Ve'ahavta, DR. SEYMOUR EPSTEIN, Vice President, Education, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and WILLIAM RECANT, Assistant Executive Vice President of the American Joint Distribution Committee, will address these questions.

COMMUNITY COMMEMORATION OF REMEMBRANCE DAY

"168 JUMP INTO HELL"

ED CARTER-EDWARDS was a young man from Hamilton who volunteered for the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II. He and 168 of his colleagues were shot down over France, avoided execution by the Gestapo, and were sent to the Buchenwald concentration camp. The atrocities they witnessed there were so unimaginable that after Liberation, few believed their story.

Following a screening of the National Film Board documentary The Lucky Ones: Allied Airmen and Buchenwald, in which airmen share their personal stories of life before, during, and after Buchenwald, Carter-Edwards will discuss this remarkable and little-known story.

Jewish War Veterans will participate in the program, bringing in the colour guard and presenting the flags.

This program is generously co-sponsored by Allan and Hinda Silber in honour of Godel and Cilka Silber.

A series of highly acclaimed Holocaust-related films will be presented during Holocaust Education Week.

"A DAY IN THE WARSAW GHETTO"

Over half a century ago, a German soldier spent a day snapping photos inside the Warsaw Ghetto. These stark images and the stories behind them comprise this documentary.

Sunday, November 10 – 8:00 pm
"THE FEAR OF FELIX NUSSBAUM"

This program pieces together the quest for the forgotten and hidden art of Felix Nussbaum, a German Jewish artist who perished in the Holocaust. What is remarkable about the story is that the campaign to resurrect his works and build a museum to house them is spearheaded by the mayor of Osnabruck, Nussbaum's home town - the same town that ostracized him over fifty years ago and watched the Nazis transport Jews to their graves.

"THE LONELINESS OF THE CANTOR"

Focusing on Jewish spiritual music, this unique documentary juxtaposes Europe's youngest cantor, 15-year-old Noam Brown from Amsterdam, with an elderly cantor from Vienna who survived the Holocaust.

Thursday, October 31 – 11:00 pm
"OUT OF THE FIRE: THE FAYE SCHULMAN STORY"

Faye Schulman, a Polish Jew now living in Toronto, survived the mass murder of her family in 1942 because, as a young photographer, she was useful to the Nazis. She later escaped and joined a group of partisans.

Thursday, November 7 – 8:00pm & 11:00pm
"LEO'S JOURNEY: STORY OF THE MENGELE TWINS"

This documentary centres on Dr. Josef Mengele's medical experiments performed on Jewish twins, and the dehumanization of life through the misapplication of science, as told through the journey of retired Canadian survivor Leo Lowry, who returns to Auschwitz-Birkenau. Interwoven are remembrances by fellow survivors of Mengele, Eva Kor and Jona Laks; original historical footage and powerful interviews with a surviving Jewish doctor; the world's leading expert on Nazi medicine, Dr. Benno Mueller-Hill; and the grandson of Mengele's sponsor and mentor, Dr. Otmar von Vershuer. Closed captioned.

EU changing views on Arafat

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The European Union (EU) is slowly moving closer to the American view of the Palestinian Authority and its president, Yasser Arafat, according to reports that have reached Jerusalem in advance of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's planned trip to Washington this week.

Comment

Last week, Arafat hosted the EU's foreign policy co-ordinator, Javier Solana, at his office in Ramallah. Solana reportedly used the meeting to deliver a stern warning and to urge Arafat to transfer the reins of power to someone else. Moreover, senior EU and United Nations officials have recently been saying in private conversations that Arafat is an obstacle to reforming the PA and must be replaced.

Solana's visit to Arafat initially elicited strong criticism from both Jerusalem and Washington. Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told Solana that his visit had hindered efforts to reform the PA. But once the contents of the conversation became known, the American administration changed its tune and praised the visit.

American Jewish population declining

By JOE BERKOFSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — America's Jewish population declined by five per cent during the past 10 years, according to a new survey, a trend that is likely to continue given the community's aging population and low birth rates.

Down by five per cent over last 10 years

The number of Jews now stands at 5.2 million, down from 5.5 million in 1990, even as the total U.S. population is growing, according to the National Jewish Population Survey 2000-2001.

The picture of a declining, greying population was unveiled last Tuesday by the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization of local Jewish federations that sponsored what is believed to be the most comprehensive demographic survey of the Jewish community to date.

The NJPS study, which surveyed 4,500 Jews from every state and the District of Columbia, cost $6 million (US), compared to only $500,000 in 1990.

TORONTO — Ve'ehavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, along with Birthright Israel and trip organizer Canada-Israel Experience, is offering a free trip to Israel "with a tikkun olam twist." The 10-day trip at the end of December is open to Jews ages 18 to 26 who have never been on an organized tour to Israel. In addition to touring, it will include social action projects such as working at a Ramle coffee shop run by the social service group Elem, which provides free snacks and counselling for youth in distress. Apply online at israelforfree.com. Deadline is Oct. 30. For more information, visit www.veahavta.org, or call 1-877-582-5472.

ISRAEL

Ze'evi Convictions

JERUSALEM — A court here convicted two Palestinians last week in the murder of Israeli cabinet minister Rehavam Ze'evi one year ago. Mohammed Rimawi was sentenced to life in prison for helping to plan the murder and being a lookout when Ze'evi was shot in Jerusalem's Hyatt Hotel. East Jerusalem resident Salakh Alawi was also convicted for giving the killers food and shelter afterward. Alawi will be sentenced later. The convicts' families protested that the real murderers are going unpunished. The members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine accused by Israel of carrying out the killing are jailed in Jericho under U.S. and British supervision, as part of a deal to end Israel's siege of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's headquarters in May.

Mitzna Refused Funds

HAIFA — Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna has reportedly refused funds offered by the Palestinian Authority (PA) for his campaign for Labour party leader. Mitzna confirmed he was approached by PA officials but said he turned down the offer, Israel's Channel Two news reported.

Outposts Dismantled

JERUSALEM — Israeli soldiers last week dismantled three uninhabited West Bank settler outposts. Wednesday's move came after Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer pledged to remove all illegal enclaves, including populated ones. The head of the army's Central Command also gave settler leaders a list of 24 outposts due to be dismantled within a week, Israel Radio reported. Settlers asked to be allowed to appeal before steps are taken. They accused Ben-Eliezer of targeting the outposts to gain support from Labour party doves as he fights for re-election as party leader next month.

Western Wall Checked

JERUSALEM — A delegation of Jordanian experts took samples of the southern part of the Western Wall last week to determine the cause of a bulge. The Jordanians arrived after a compromise was reached between Israeli and Palestinian officials. Israel's Antiquities Authority has warned that all or part of the section of the wall could collapse. An Israeli watchdog group has blamed the bulge on mosque renovation work by the Wakf Islamic Trust. The wakf says the bulge was there before work began.

Poet's Ouster Sought

NEW YORK — New Jersey Governor James McGreevey is seeking the power to fire the state's poet laureate, Amiri Baraka, who last month read a poem insinuating that Israel knew in advance about the Sept. 11 terror attacks. McGreevey said last week he has enlisted state legislators to introduce bipartisan legislation giving him authority to end Baraka's two-year term.

Israel a Threat: Poll

PARIS — Israel has been ranked second, just after Iraq, on a list of countries that threaten world peace, in a poll conducted jointly by five local newspapers in northwest France with a combined readership of 175,000. Following Iraq and Israel on the 15-country list are, in order, Afghanistan, the United States, Palestine, Iran, Pakistan, Algeria and Libya. Syria ranks 12th. Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior attributed the results to distortions in the French media's Mideast coverage.

Ono Peace Prize

NEW YORK — An Israeli artist and a Palestinian artist were the first recipients of a peace prize that Yoko Ono created in memory of husband John Lennon. Last Wednesday, Ono presented $50,000 (US) each to Zvi Goldstein and Khalil Rabah and thanked them "for being so creative and inspirational despite the intense political situation we all live in." The event at the United Nations was held on what would have been Lennon's 62nd birthday.

STOCKHOLM — A U.S-based Israeli academic, a Hungarian author and Holocaust survivor and an MIT professor last week won Nobel Prizes in economics, literature and medicine, respectively.

Daniel Kahneman, 68, a psychologist by training who teaches at Princeton University and is also a U.S. citizen, became the fifth Israeli to win a Nobel when the Swedish Royal Academy of Sciences awarded him the prize in economic sciences for disproving commonly held assumptions that economic decision-making processes are rational.

Kahneman, who was born in Tel Aviv in 1934, will share the $1.1 million (US) prize with American Vernon Smith.

Kahneman, a fellow of Hebrew University's Centre for the Study of Rationality and Interactive Decision Theory, developed his theory 20 years ago with Prof. Amos Tversky, who died six years ago. He said he was accepting the prize for both himself and Tversky.

Imre Kertesz, a Budapest-born Jew whose fiction draws on his experience as a teen in Auschwitz, won the Nobel Prize for literature "for writing that upholds the fragile experience of the individual against the barbaric arbitrariness of history."

The academy singled out his debut 1975 novel Sorstalanság (Fateless), about a young man who is arrested and taken to a concentration camp, "but conforms and survives."

Kertesz, 72, is the first Hungarian to win the Nobel for literature, though Hungarians have won Nobel science awards.

Kidnapped soldier's father urges action

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After IDF soldiers Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham and Omar Souad were kidnapped by Hezbollah terrorists along the Lebanese border on Oct. 7, 2000, Avraham's father Haim was haunted by a song that kept running through his head.

The tune, popular in Israel when Haim was a boy, was Ema Mechakah Babayit (Mom's Waiting at Home). Its title became the name of the charitable/activist organization he helped found to learn the fate of the soldiers and bring them home.

Avraham spoke at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last week in an event co-sponsored by the Israel Now Consortium, Shaarei Shomayim, Holy Blossom Temple and Beth Tzedec Congregation. He also addressed members of the consortium at the Lipa Green Building, and visited Jewish schools and university campuses, along with his wife Edna, to talk to students. Their North American visit included stops in Montreal, Ottawa and Washington, D.C., to speak to lay audiences and government officials.

Although Israel has declared the soldiers dead, the Avrahams still hold out hope that they are alive. "We want to know what's happened to our children," Avraham said in an interview following his talk at the Lipa Green Building, his voice cracking with emotion and tears filling his eyes.

He maintains there is evidence that Benny is alive, and that there is no evidence to the contrary. There's a picture he said was taken in a Lebanese hospital six weeks after the kidnapping, an item that Benny threw from the car during the incident – as discussed earlier with his parents – to indicate that he was alive, and the picture showing bloodstains in the car that took the soldiers away.

"We saw the bloodstain. It's not so big," said Haim, delineating an area about an inch by an-inch-and-a-half. Even the Israel government says there is no evidence of the soldiers' deaths, according to Haim, who lost his brother Benny in the Yom Kippur War in 1973. Benny, his son, who was 20 when he was kidnapped, was named for the brother.

On the advice of a military rabbi, the Avrahams and the Avitan family sat shivah "conditionally" last November. (The third soldier, Omar Souad, is from a Bedouin family.) "If they come back healthy, it will mean good luck for many years," said Edna, a post-operative care nurse.

The Israeli government's top priority is "finishing the war, and we understand that [as citizens], but we can't accept it as parents," Haim said.

For the past two years, the Avrahams, who also have

Anti-Semitism in academia (2)

Last week in this space, I recorded some of the highlights of the symposium sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University the preceding Sunday on the subject of Anti-Semitism in Academia.

Professors Laurie Zoloth of San Francisco State University and Menachem Kellner of Haifa University delivered insightful and impassioned, though anguished, presentations about their own, personal encounters with anti-Semitism.

The presentations were chilling.

From the editor's desk

Zoloth spoke about the increasing intimidation on campuses, since the launching of the Palestinian campaign against Israel on Sept. 28, 2000 and especially after 9/11, of the Jewish and other professors, and, of course, the students, who attempt to identify with or speak out on behalf of Israel.

"Why has the American left turned so much against Israel even to the point of not defending free speech on campus when it comes to Jewish causes?" Zoloth wondered out loud.

Kellner recounted five troubling incidents specifically involving British academics, all of which entailed the singling out of Israel, Israelis or Jews.

One of the incidents revolved around the submission by two professors from Haifa University of an essay to a political geography journal.

The editor to whom the essay was sent was not willing "to deal with an article submitted by two Israeli scholars." Under the circumstances, he advised the authors, it was better for them to re-submit the article to the co-editor. The editor refused even to consider the essay because of the nationality of the authors.

"These are stories that we know about," Kellner told the audience. "How many such cases occur that we do not know about? It is a very frightening thought that there might be an informal conspiracy isolating Israeli academics."

It is indeed frightening — and infuriating — but not, alas, unlikely.

"Why do so many academics and intellectuals buy into the Palestinian narrative and eagerly vilify Israel? Why are Israeli errors placed in the foreground while Palestinian ones are placed in the background?" Kellner asked, echoing the thoughts, if not the words of his colleague.

In heartbreaking detail, both speakers described the odious rhetoric aimed at demonizing Israel that is so commonplace on campuses today.

Zoloth analyzed the components of that rhetoric as the reappearance, in modern uniform, of five medieval stereotypes.

Kellner suggested a number of possible explanations and concluded that Israel is seen as the avatar of all western values and thus is held in contempt by individuals who hold those values in contempt, including, ironically, by a great deal of the western intellectual left.

"How could this be happening again?" was the question that hung in the air, unasked, but likely coursing through the minds and hearts of most of the audience.

Then, an elderly gentleman stepped to the microphone and with humble, plaintive voice asked: "What are we to do? What do we tell our children? What do we tell our grandchildren when they ask me: 'Zaydie Max, why do they hate the Jews?'"

Neither Zoloth nor Kellner answered him directly, except to reiterate aspects of the remarks they had already delivered.

In truth, however, they had already answered him indirectly in the many bits and pieces of inspiration that sparked from their words like specks of fire flying from dark, hard pieces of flint striking rock.

Both Zoloth and Kellner emphasized to the audience that they considered themselves firmly in the camp of the "progressive" left. This, of course, explained one of the reasons for the extreme betrayal they felt at the hands of their fellow "progressive leftists." But it also explained one of the reasons that they were so determined not to surrender academia, the pre-eminent arena of public discourse, to the people who have betrayed them.

"Scholarship is not neutral," Zoloth asserted emphatically. "It is our duty to insist that the academy remain a place where there must be free speech and that the tyranny of the left will not be tolerated.

"Jews also have a liberation movement. We also have a history of fighting oppression." Jews, she urged, will not be deprived of our liberation movement nor of our history.

"Suicide bombing is impermissible, always," Zoloth said. "We (by which, I believe, Zoloth meant we Jews generally, and people of the left, specifically) must be the first to speak out on these matters… We must defend Israel's right to exist even in the very heart of the poisonous demonstrations against Israel. We must counter and challenge every false accusation levelled against Israel."

With equal resolve, Kellner reminded the audience that by defending Israel, we – Jews and people of good conscience throughout the West – are also defending the values that are precious to us as Jews and as people of the western, democratic world. That is our answer; that is our path.

We are now at a time, some 57 years after the end of World War II and 54 years after the creation of the State of Israel, when Jewish history calls upon us all to show our own courage, as Zoloth implored, to "counter and challenge every false accusation leveled against Israel."

Zaydie Max can tell his grandchildren that the reasons people may have for hating Jews say more about them than they do about the Jews. He can also tell them Judaism's beauty is as deep and eternal as heaven itself, that a small embattled people has proudly and miraculously carried its unique, life-affirming mission for more than 3,000 years and has returned, finally, sovereign, to its ancestral home, where it will remain forever. —MBD

Separation better than re-occupation: Labor MK

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel should separate from the Palestinians instead of re-occupying their main towns in the West Bank, says the new secretary-general of Israel's Labour party.

Calling for a fresh approach to the conflict with the Palestinians, Ophir Pines-Paz said that Israel's strategy should hinge on two interrelated elements: separation, which entails withdrawals from the territories, and a fortified fence along the West Bank, which is now being built.

"We are stuck with a situation in which we don't have a real answer to terrorism," he said in an interview during a brief stopover in Toronto recently.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon should have opted for separation rather than ordering the re-occupation of major towns in the Palestinian autonomous areas, said Pines-Paz, whose party is a key component of Sharon's national unity government.

"We should try to find an alternative to re-occupation," added Pines-Paz, who was appointed secretary-general on July 7.

"We have to leave [the West Bank and Gaza Strip] step by step."

Pines-Paz, a Knesset member since 1996, urged Sharon to extend the Bethlehem-Gaza pilot withdrawal program to the rest of the territories.

The plan came into effect in mid-August on the recommendation of Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, the leader of the Labour party.

"We should have started separation a year ago. It can give us two advantages. Separation is a very important tool in fighting terrorism and in preserving Israel's Jewish character and democracy."

A member of the Knesset's pivotal foreign affairs and security committee, he voiced optimism that separation is achievable.

"There is an alternative to re-occupation," said Pines-Paz, who was here under the auspices of the New Israel Fund. During the course of a hectic day, he addressed several Canadian Friends of Peace Now parlour meetings.

He suggested that Israel's only hope of ending the current conflict is by simultaneously fighting terrorism and entering into political negotiations with the Palestinians.

"We haven't done that, and it's a big mistake."

Sooner or later, he noted, Israel will have to return to the Camp David-Taba peacemaking formula, the core of which is a two-state solution based on a massive Israeli pullout from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

"Seventy per cent to 80 per cent of Israelis support this," he claimed. "The question is, do we have a partner?"

Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, no longer qualifies as a credible negotiating partner, Pines-Paz said.

"People like Abu Mazen are partners, and we should work with them."

Mahmoud Abbas, popularly known as Abu Mazen, is the secretary-general of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and was one of the architects of the Oslo peace process.

Saying that Abu Mazen should replace Arafat as the Palestinians' top leader, Pines-Paz warned that Arafat's ouster from the West Bank would be counter-productive.

"Look what happened at the siege in Ramallah," he observed, referring to Israel's latest assault on Arafat's headquarters after back-to-back suicide bombings on Sept. 18 and 19.

"We made Arafat a hero."

Turning to another topical issue, Pines-Paz said the democratic free world should back an American attempt to disarm Iraq and unseat its president, Saddam Hussein.

"Saddam's regime is a model for others, like Libya. We have to learn from Afghanistan," he said in a reference to the toppling of the Taliban government by the United States and its allies.

Israel may be the victim of a preemptive Iraqi attack, he acknowledged.

But in the long run, Israel may gain a measure of security from Saddam's demise.

Praising Israel's policy of restraint in the 1991 Gulf War, he said,"On some occasions, restraint is power."

During the Gulf War, the Israeli government held its fire as Iraq hit Israel with 39 Scud missiles, causing widespread property damage and one death.

Asked if Israel should retaliate in the event of another Iraqi barrage, Pines-Paz said it would depend on the severity of the blow.

Israel will have no choice but to respond militarily if Iraq's attack is of a serious nature. But he also said he could see no circumstances under which Israel would resort to using its nuclear arsenal.

In general, Israel ought to co-ordinate its policy on Iraq with that of the United States, he said.

Pines-Paz, who is also a member of the Knesset's committee for immigration, absorption and the Diaspora, was asked whether the Law of Return should be modified in light of the fact that the majority of new immigrants from Russia over the past few years are said to be halachically non-Jewish.

The Law of Return, which encourages immigrants to settle in Israel, defines a Jew as someone with at least one Jewish grandparent.

Even though Holocaust Education Week is in its 22nd year, there has been no shortage of ideas for programs. "They're adding new programs right until the brochure goes to press," said Barbara Rusch, chair of this year's Holocaust Education Week.

The annual event, which is co-ordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, will run from Oct. 30 to Nov. 11 at a variety of locations around the city.

The series of 110 lectures and presentations will kick off at 7:30 p.m. Oct. 30 at Beth Tzedec Congregation with Hana's Suitcase, a story that began when a Holocaust-era suitcase belonging to a young girl, Hana Brady, ended up at the Tokyo Holocaust Education Centre two years ago, prompting the centre's curator, Fumiko Ishioka, to investigate the girl's fate.

The story became a book by Karen Levine, who will speak at the program. She will also introduce her award-winning radio documentary on the same subject, and will be joined by moderator Michael Enright of CBC; and speakers George Brady (Hana's brother), and Ishioka.

This year, instead of the usual Kristallnacht closing program, Holocaust Education Week will end on Remembrance Day with a talk at Beth Sholom Synagogue by Ed Carter-Edwards, a World War II veteran from Hamilton who was shot down over France and sent to the Buchenwald concentration camp. Jewish war veterans will participate in the program.

To commemorate Kristallnacht on Nov. 9, Irwin Cotler, human rights crusader and MP for Mount Royal, Que., will discuss Echoes of Kristallnacht in our Time. The program will take place at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"There are many varied and really interesting programs," said Rusch. "There are so many researchers, artists and writers who every year are committed to taking the Holocaust and its commemoration to new heights and new levels that previously haven't even been thought of."

Along with personal testimonies of Holocaust survivors and a myriad of other events, some of the programs are The Ringelblum Archives (from the Warsaw Ghetto) with Warsaw curator Eleonora Bergman (Nov. 2, Holocaust Centre of Toronto); A Place to Save Your Life, a film on the Jews of Shanghai (Nov. 3, Stan Wadlow Seniors' Centre); the dedication of Megillat HaShoah, a new liturgy to be used in congregations worldwide on Yom Hashoah (Nov. 7, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation); Eichmann in my Hands, with Peter Malkin who captured Nazi war criminal Adolph Eichmann in 1960 (Nov. 3, Shaar Shalom Synagogue); and Displaced Persons: Growing Up American after the Holocaust with Joseph Berger, author of the memoir Displaced Persons (Nov. 5, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue).

Robert Fulford decries anti-Israel boycotts

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Veteran journalist Robert Fulford was corrected by a theatre director in Israel this summer when he assumed she was embarking on a delightful trip to recruit talent for a local arts festival.

"No, it's the opposite of delightful," Ofira Henig told Fulford. "Everywhere I go, I'll be accused of oppressing the Palestinians and I'll be asked how I can come to wherever it is representing the vicious government of Israel."

Fulford, a National Post columnist, recounted the story recently at a dinner for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto campaign canvassers held at the Capitol Theatre. The campaign, which began four months ahead of schedule this year due to the situation in Israel, has raised more than $56 million so far, nearly $20 million more than last year at the same time.

Fulford said that night in Jerusalem was the first time he had heard directly from victims of the academic and professional boycotts instituted by European intellectuals against Israel and Israelis.

"We discussed the peculiar fact that the boycotters were striking out not at the government of Israel but at individual Israelis, some of them opponents of the Sharon government, many of them lifelong supporters of various Palestinian causes and many of them friends and colleagues of Palestinian individuals," he said.

Fulford also told of novelist and poet Michal Govrin, whose invitation to read her work at a Tasmanian writers' festival was withdrawn as a protest against the killing of Palestinian children. A Tasmanian newspaper supported her, and she proceeded to attend after the festival backed down, said Fulford, but it was "a bitter victory."

To oppose the policies of the government of Israel is not anti-Semitic, said Fulford, but he's never heard of boycotting artists because of their citizenship.

The world has decided "not only that the Palestinians are oppressed – that's an opinion – but also that these oppressed people, the Palestinians, deserve about 100 times as much attention as all the other oppressed people in the world," said Fulford.

As someone committed to western values, Fulford is "obviously" on the side of Israel with its free press and other characteristics of a democratic society. But, he noted, because many intellectuals regard such values and institutions as a "cover-up," they are inclined to look at the Palestinian cause with sympathy and at Jerusalem as a centre of oppression.

"Those committed to a western liberal democracy find it hard to understand why the values of the West can't be planted elsewhere, no matter how hard people try. Why, for instance, is there no democracy in all the Arab countries?" he asked. "There's a hint of democracy here and there, but no democracy."

Shimon Peres, now Israel's foreign minister, exemplified the West's and Israel's "honest bafflement," having assumed that the Middle East "badly needed the values and practices of the west and that the [region,] given half a chance, would embrace them," said Fulford.

Having spoken to left-wing Israelis like Hirsh Goodman, founder of the Jerusalem Report, Fulford said the mix of emotions he heard accompanying their change in politics is unlike anything he's heard before: "melancholy mingled with anger mingled with self-disgust. Most of them tacitly or directly support the policies of Ariel Sharon, about whom few of them would have said one kind word two years ago."

While Fulford admitted this could be depressing news, he was impressed by the dynamism and commitment of the Israelis he met.

On a personal note, he added that although his wife, Geraldine Sherman, and their two daughters are Jewish, his interest in Jewish issues predates their relationship by many years. He described his perspective as "the critical sympathy of an admiring friend."

Advice freely given, but of little value

Last week, the outgoing leader of the NDP, Alexa McDonough, rose in the House of Commons to reproach the Canadian government for what she called its "shameful silence in the face of the spiralling death toll in Israel and in the occupied territories."

McDonough's statement was triggered by an Israel Defence Forces attack on a Hamas stronghold in Khan Yunis in the Gaza Strip, in which some 16 Palestinians died. Indeed, she was not alone in Canada or in other western countries to have expressed displeasure with the IDF's operation. U.S. President George W. Bush, for example, did so as well.

Israel acknowledged that four of the 16 people killed were civilians and expressed its profound remorse for the loss of innocent life. The Palestinians, of course, disputed Israel's figures. Along with its apology, however, Israel also said it had no reasonable option other than to attack where it did if it is to root out the leaders and gunmen of Hamas. And Israel must root them out if it is to defend itself and try to bring about the conditions for peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians. Hamas and Islamic Jihad have publicly sworn to oppose co-existence with Israel. Moreover, they are violently opposed to any Palestinian leadership that would try to bring about such coexistence. Indeed, last week, Hamas gunmen killed a high-ranking Palestinian Authority (PA) police official, sparking a day of bloody inter-Palestinian clashes.

But striking at Hamas and Islamic Jihad may unavoidably mean civilian casualties. As all western intelligence agencies know, Hamas and Islamic Jihad deliberately place their command posts, bases of operations, weapons and explosives in residential districts and public institutions such as schools and hospitals. That is their modus operandi. Their contempt for life extends also to the lives of their own people.

And what, precisely, did McDonough say in the Commons? She said, among other things, that "Canada must find the courage to speak the truth: that we need a renewed commitment to peace, achievable only upon the immediate end to the illegal occupation of Palestinian territories. Peace will come only when Israelis and Palestinians negotiate a means whereby each can live safely and securely within their respective borders."

But what did her statement mean? McDonough called for an "immediate end to the illegal occupation." Setting aside the use of the loaded and dubious phrase "illegal occupation," how does she propose that Israel immediately end the occupation? Does she mean simply, unilaterally, closing shop and handing the keys to PA President Yasser Arafat or to Hamas? If so, how can her call to immediately end the occupation be reconciled with her call to negotiate? Indeed, with whom should Israel negotiate? Should it negotiate with the man who rejected negotiations two years ago, then launched a war on the Jewish State that continues to this day, or should it negotiate with the leaders of Hamas, whose highest mission is the elimination of the Jewish State and its Jewish citizens?

CMDA needs help

In your article on Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom (CJN, Oct. 3) you report, according to counsel for the charity, "the operation was a success, but the patient died."

May I respectfully suggest that, where, as in this case, the patient died (or, more accurately, is now in mortal danger but not dead yet), the operation was perforce a failure. It certainly failed as far as the patient (client) is concerned – who is, after all, the only person that counts in a given case. Canadian Magen David Adom is a valuable organization whose survival is currently in jeopardy and needs help from any quarter possible.

Will still buy at women's bookstore

I am writing in response to the recent article about the Toronto Women's Bookstore ("Bookstore to keep selling pro-Palestinian buttons," CJN, Sept. 19). The women's bookstore has been and continues to be a resource for the Jewish community. It has had Jewish staff and board members. It carries books by and about Jewish women, books about the Holocaust and about other forms of anti-Semitism.

I believe that Zaretsky is confusing anti-Semitism with criticism of Israeli government policies. While criticism of Israel can sometimes be accompanied by expressions of anti-Jewish sentiment, this is not always the case. And it certainly isn't the case in this instance. There are many outstanding and loyal Jews around the world and in Israel who disagree with Israeli government policy.

While Zaretsky might have bought his last book from the bookstore, I certainly haven't. I believe we should continue to support this important resource for the downtown Jewish community. I also believe that we should respect the diversity of Jewish opinion on Israeli government actions. It is only when we speak to one another about our differences that we will build a strong and vibrant Jewish community.

Intermarriage and membership

As a Jew and as a Canadian, I am deeply saddened by Adath Israel's exclusionary policy denying membership to Jews with non-Jewish spouses. In fact, I would go so far as to say that it is a shameful policy. My father brought us out of the reprehensible apartheid era South Africa with the dream of raising a family in a just and moral sciety. It is ironic that we fled from a country where inter-racial marriages were abhorred and where "whites" who dared marry outside of their "race" were treated as outcasts. Jews are constantly proclaiming how anti-Semitic this world is, how unwelcoming and intolerant. With all the horrors that we have seen and all that we have suffered, Jews perhaps more than any other people should demonstrate tolerance and understanding and be a light unto the world.

Ivri Anochi

During the past year the world has heard from the secular Jew, the left-wing Jew, the Peace Now Jew, the Reform Jew, the Conservative Jew, the Reconstructionist Jew, the Israeli Jew, the American Jew, the European Jew, the traditional Jew, the Orthodox Jew, the haredi Jew, the Sephardi Jew, the Ashkenazi Jew, the Agudah Jew, the Mizrachi Jew, etc.

No wonder everyone is totally confused!

The world is trying to figure out who we are, and for that matter, so are we.

What if we just stopped calling ourselves Jews, and start calling ourselves by the name Ivri? This is the name by which Avraham Avinu was referred to. Simply translated, Ivri means we are on one side with HaShem and the Torah as our guide, and everyone else is on the other side. The world now falls into two distinct entities. No more confusion or name calling. In order to be called an Ivri, one must accept and follow HaShem and the Torah as our father Avraham Avinu did.

We will have accomplished several important steps in our quest to bring true peace and the coming of Mashiach.

Ivri Anochi – Am Yisrael Chai!

Responding to allegations

In the Aug. 22 issue of The CJN, David Goldberg and Tilly Shames comment on my Counterpunch article "What's so bad about Israel?" While their citations are accurate, some of their remarks or suggestions require a response.

First, I do not use my university as a platform for my political views. I have never discussed Israel on campus, let alone in class. Any mention of my position or affiliation was Counterpunch's doing, not my own. The suggestion that I "skew the intellectual debate about Israel" in Canadian universities is therefore a non-starter.

Second, your readers ought to know that I am Jewish, from a family that lost many relatives in Hitler's camps. Though my articles may fairly be described as anti-Israel, what I advocate – unilateral, immediate withdrawal from the occupied territories – is not. Withdrawal will enhance both Jewish and Israeli security, to say nothing of countering the moral decay among Israelis. My views hardly put me outside the Jewish community, but well within a debate that now involves a rising tide of Jewish dissent.

The story of my star

By MICHAEL GORDON

It has been many years since I wore the chain and Star of David. I found it again in the small purse in which I kept some other valuables, including a gold tie pin with my initials, which I received as a bar mitzvah gift. I wore the chain continuously until my marriage 20 years ago when I put it safely away. I now felt the desire to wear it again as I slipped it over my head, the six-pointed Magen David surrounded by the circle reaching down to my mid-chest.

Michael Gordon

The story of my chain and star is special to me. I had never worn such a symbol of my Judaism during my years of growing up in Brooklyn. Being Jewish in Brooklyn during those years was easy – many of my friends and neighbours were Jewish, and even though the public schools I attended were mixed, the recognition of the Jewish population resulted in most schools virtually, if not actually, closing on important Jewish holidays. Other than the fact that my maternal grandmother had visited Israel in the early 1950s with her Yiddish choir, I had little personal connection to that country. I knew of its recent post-war history, but did not have a special interest in its development.

That changed in 1965 during my first visit to the country as a Scottish medical student, soon after I had acquired my star. I had chosen to study medicine in Scotland rather than the United States so that I could travel and explore as much of the world as possible during my college years. My 1965 trip to Israel was part of that agenda.

Though I acquired the star that year, I already had the gold chain on which it was to hang – I had found it on a beach the previous year when I was vacationing in the Canary Islands with my favourite professor from pre-medical study years at Brooklyn College. I saw something glistening under the water one late afternoon near the uncrowded shore and found the gold chain with its attached St. Christopher's medal. I gave the latter to a young girl on the beach, as I had no reason to keep it, but kept the chain for myself. I wore it as such, an unadorned chain that brought back fond memories of the Las Palmas Beach.

Before my trip to Israel, where I was booked to do some obstetrics and gynecology in Haifa, I was in Vienna on my way to Greece for a month's work in an Athens hospital. At the student hostel, there was an advertisement for Erwin Leiser's 1960 film Mein Kampf/Adolph Hitler. Since I had a deep interest by this time in the history of the Holocaust, I decided to catch the afternoon show. The theatre was almost empty. In front of me sat two fellows in their late teens. During the scenes depicting the rise and triumphs of Hitler, they cheered with obvious joy. During the final concentration camp scenes where Jewish bodies were shown being buried in mass graves, they laughed loudly and jabbed each other with apparent glee.

In the knapsack at my feet, I had my eight-inch hunting knife that I used for cutting bread and cheese and for opening cans, a common practice for students who were travelling. Livid with anger as the film came to a close, I fingered my knife, wondering if I should brandish it.

I could not provide an adequate explanation, so I let the knife slip back into my knapsack.

As they disappeared around a corner, I decided to hang a Jewish Star on my chain.

I entered the first rather large jewelry store I saw, and in my broken German explained that I wanted to buy a stern (German for star). When showed a gold five-pointed star, I said, "No, a Judisha stern," and drew the Magen David on a sheet of paper. The saleswoman blanched and said in understandable English, "We have them no more." I went from jeweller to jeweller and had similar responses, which ranged from apparent dismissive ignorance to mildly sympathetic disbelief that I would even ask.

I was despondent. Suddenly I came upon a very small jewelry store on a narrow street. In the display case, along with a number of gold charms clearly intended for a bracelet, was a small Magen David surrounded by a circle of gold. I could not believe it. I entered the store and asked to see it. When I asked the price and showed the proprietor, a bespectacled man in his late forties, the chain that I wanted it attached to, he asked who the chain was for. I answered, "Fur mir." He said $2 as he strung the gold loop on to my chain. I thought I heard him wrong. I took out my Austrian schillings, from which he accepted only $2 worth. He smiled at me as I thanked him profusely. When he asked where I was from, I told him I was originally from New York. I left the store coveting my star.

In Israel, while working in obstetrics and gynecology, I had my first medical experience with Holocaust survivors. They were being treated for Holocaust-related diseases, including infertility. In New York, I had seen a few of my grandmother's eastern European friends with numbers on their arms, but this was my first professional encounter with survivors of Hitler's concentration camps. The Vienna experience and my star took on a new meaning for me. For the following 15 years, I was never without the star. During the year-and-a-half that I served in the Israeli Air Force, from 1969 until 1971, and during the entire four years that I lived in Israel, the chain and star constantly got tangled with the dog tags that I was required to wear at all times. In the early 1980s, after I had been back in Canada for about seven years, I chose to stop wearing the star for personal esthetic reasons.

The recent destructive actions directed against Jews and Israelis have affected me deeply. Irrespective of my views on the Middle East conflict, my Jewish identity has intensified. The Hebrew University bombing on July 31 left me reeling. I felt rage, profound sadness and vulnerability as a Jew and a Canadian university professor. This event compelled me to find my star and wear it once again as a symbolic affirmation of my identity and my determination to support the future existence of Jews and Israelis, wherever they may be.

Washington – another look

Some weeks ago, I wrote about my visit to Washington, D.C., pointing out the various surprising and memorable aspects of that unique city.

Another visit has opened additional vistas and made me eager to comprehend the true nature of the American capital. It didn't take long to discover that this is a task I cannot master, for there are too many aspects to it, aside from the prejudice any visitor is bound to bring.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This was my second visit in two months, and I must admit I have fallen in love with the city. Saying this does not in any way detract from my affection for Toronto, my home of more than 40 years.

I have asked myself just how these two important North American cities manage to hold a visitor's interest. Living in Toronto, I am invariably impressed with the multifarious composition of its population. We are host to natives of more than 120 nations, and we can be proud that our history shows how people from so many different backgrounds can live together peacefully and fruitfully.

What struck me on my second visit to Washington was that its natural environment seems to reflect its nature and destiny, its fruitful diversity, and its remarkable beauty. I had never known the city's physical attraction, and I have become its admirer and captive.

This has nothing to do with the politics that ordinarily define America's capital and its struggle for political supremacy. To me, that is comforting and familiar, since in that respect, it is similar to Canada's capital. For whenever I visit Ottawa, I am also struck by its physical attractiveness. It is not located in central Canada, yet it has managed to earn the pride and admiration of Canadians. I am always glad to visit and admire its memorable buildings and open spaces.

My latest visit to Washington has fortified a similar feeling. It, too, is located far from America's centre. Yet, it has managed to gain a place of great respect as the political representative of the United States (a position once filled by New York City), and I must admit I feel quite a thrill when I visit. For aside from its physical beauty, it has outstanding cultural treasures the public can enjoy.

My judgment of Washington may be somewhat partial. For I am not just a Canadian visitor, I am also an American citizen and I gratefully recall that the United States saved me from the Nazis. I fought the latter as a U.S. soldier in World War II, long before migrating to Canada, whose citizenship I also prize and cherish.

I hope to return to Washington from time to time to enjoy its many offerings.

Passing the plaques in Jerusalem

To live in Jerusalem these days is to be constantly reminded you are a target of Palestinian terrorists. Never mind the frequent threats from Hamas and the Islamic Jihad that more attacks are on the way. Evidence of their previous atrocities is everywhere.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Just stroll through many of the city's neighborhoods and you'll pass the site of a past bombing or shooting rampage. Such is the predilection of terrorists for Jerusalem and the scope of their onslaught that few areas in the centre of the city have been spared their murderous acts.

It is a particularly sobering experience to walk downtown and confront – as one inevitably does – the sites of so many past slaughters. Within a two block radius, you see where 10 massacres were carried out since the Palestinians launched their current war against Israel two years ago.

The stone plaques and small memorials scattered throughout the city testify to the scale of tragedy that Jerusalem has suffered – scores of men, women and children killed and hundreds seriously wounded. And to think it would be far worse if not for the heroic efforts of Israeli security services, which have foiled countless other planned attacks.

Lately, when foreign dignitaries or Jewish solidarity missions visit Jerusalem, they invariably make a pilgrimage to the place where a major attack has occurred, in homage to the victims. The visitors have a gruesomely wide selection to choose from: Hebrew University, Café Moment, Sbarro Restaurant, Machane Yehuda Market, Ben Yehuda Pedestrian Mall, Jaffa Street, King George Street, French Hill intersection, the bus stop next to Beit Zafafa.

These places were already well-known before the violence. Palestinian mass murderers put them on the map for the most repulsive reason possible. As a result, these sites have become unofficial landmarks of terror and inhumanity, all carved into the collective memory of Jerusalemites.

These high profile acts of terror are well documented, but they do not tell the whole story. Police statistics show there have been nearly 150 terrorist attacks of varying severity in Jerusalem since the end of 2000. The list – and extent of premeditated killing – is chilling. Few if any other cities in the world have ever had to face such a sustained assault.

Looking back further, it is staggering to see what Jerusalemites have experienced in the way of Palestinian terror since the so-called peace process began in 1993. Those with the time and inclination – to say nothing of the stomach – could spend several days just visiting the places in Jerusalem where Palestinians have carried out suicide bombings – or as they call them, martyr operations – and other terrorist attacks. It would be a shocking tour of deliberate death and destruction.

When I first moved to Paris as a young man of 19, I was taken aback by the many plaques I saw on the facades of buildings that detailed how, during World War II, at a particular location on such a date, Jews were arrested and deported to Nazi death camps. Or that anti-Nazi Resistance members were killed fighting the Germans. These reminders of a loaded past gave each location an added dimension. The juxtaposition between the seemingly ordinary buildings and the terrible events that had occurred there was haunting.

Sadly, Jerusalem is now home to many such plaques. Of course, a simple plaque cannot even begin to describe the horror of what happened on a certain day – innocent people blown to smithereens, others horribly maimed and traumatized forever, and those whose lives have been shattered by the loss of loved ones.

For Jerusalem, a city so rich in history, so much of the latest chapter is, regrettably, being written in blood. No one can really say what the lasting impact of this nightmare on the city, and the country at large, will be. It is sure to be a long time before Jerusalemites forget what they have had to live through in recent years – and continue to face every day. If nothing else, the plaques will be there to remind them.

Protest terror - ride Israel's buses

The thousands of self-proclaimed "peace activists" and "human rights monitors," including many Canadians, that pass through Israel's Ben-Gurion Airport generally head in one direction – straight for the Palestinian territories.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For this group, as well as the journalists and many of the diplomats that follow the same route, the Palestinians still have an ideological monopoly on suffering.

With no knowledge of Middle Eastern history or Jewish links to Israel, they flock to Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat's compound to demonstrate solidarity when he is under siege following a Palestinian terror attack. In contrast, the hundreds of Israelis – children, women and men – who have been brutally killed and the thousands who have been injured in a campaign initiated and directed by Arafat and his associates have generally been ignored.

However, a slow change is taking place among some of the more sincere and serious members of groups that advocate international peace and human rights. The Palestinian strategy, based on bus-bombings, attacks on restaurants and other forms of terrorism, is gradually being recognized as fundamentally immoral.

After ignoring this inhuman brutality for more than a year, human rights groups now issue carefully balanced reports that also condemn Palestinian support for terrorism and the incitement to hate. (In general, political correctness still produces at least equal criticism directed at "Israeli occupation" for causing economic suffering and "humiliation," but these myths can eventually be exposed.)

To go further and demonstrate a serious commitment to the principles of non-violence and opposition to terror, these activists also have to become visible on the Israeli side.

One of the best ways to gain credibility among Israelis and influence Palestinian actions would be to ride Israeli buses.

Media images of "peace campaigners" getting on and off the buses in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and other places, taking the same risks that Israelis take every day, will send a powerful message to the bombers and their supporters on the Palestinian side that even their strongest supporters will not tolerate attacks. This experience will also give them some understanding of the fears and terror that we live with all the time.

By visibly riding the buses, international peace advocates may also contribute directly to deterrence and the prevention of attacks, thereby saving innocent lives.

A growing number of Palestinians have begun to openly criticize their leadership, including Arafat and the heads of Hamas and other terror groups, for conducting and encouraging suicide/homicide bombings over the past two years. Continuing with this murderous strategy with the knowledge that victims could include international observers might persuade Arafat and PA officials to end their double game and finally take action to end these attacks.

Beyond the very powerful message that would be sent by such actions, riding the buses to protest terror should only be one step in a broader campaign against hatred and violence.

A Washington, D.C.-based group known as Search for Common Ground has already started a movement aimed at inculcating the principle of non-violence, particularly among Palestinians. Recent polls indicate that these concepts are making some headway among Palestinians, although their definition of "non-violence" remains too flexible and is often interpreted to include rock-throwing and other similar acts.

Even where it is accepted, non-violence is often viewed as a tactic to advance the Palestinian goal of eliminating Israel as a Jewish state. As a result, education toward tolerance and the acceptance of compromise based on recognition of Jewish rights is an extremely important goal for any peace group. On this basis, the principle of non-violent resolution of disputes has a chance of eventually becoming a reality.

By riding the Israeli buses, eating and drinking coffee with Israelis in corner cafes and restaurants and generally living the life that Israelis live, individuals and government officials, including Canadians, can also lay the foundations for non-violence.

The question is whether any of these groups and individuals will take up this challenge.

Jewish-interest movies graced Toronto festival

Last month's Toronto International Film Festival offered viewers a wide selection of Jewish-interest movies, some of which are expected to open shortly.

Does the name Sabina Spielrein strike a responsive chord? Probably not. Although she was a charter member of the new field of psychoanalysis, she has been all but forgotten since her death at the hands of the Nazis 60 years ago.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Spielrein, the granddaughter of a rabbi, published the first psychoanalytical work on children and was a pioneer in child psychology. A patient and confidante of Carl Gustav Jung, she was the second woman to be inducted into the Vienna Psychoanalytical Society, a brainchild of the redoubtable Sigmund Freud.

In 1977, Spielrein's diaries and letters, including her correspondence with Jung and Freud, were discovered in the basement of a building in Geneva, Switzerland. Her papers were deemed important, as they cast light on the history of psychoanalysis.

Elisabeth Marton's earnest film, My Name Was Sabina Spielrein, probes her place in psychoanalysis as well as her relationship with Jung and Freud, the founding fathers of that discipline.

The scion of a prosperous family, she arrived in the Swiss city of Zurich in 1904, not as a visitor but as Jung's first patient in the Bergholzli clinic. Using Freud's novel methods, Jung, then 29 and married, treated the Russian teenager with hypnosis and electro-therapy and diagnosed her with hysteria. A gifted student, Spielrein was drawn to pain, which apparently stimulated her sexuality.

Jung, who formed a close attachment to Spielrein, discharged her in 1905, at which point she began her medical studies at the University of Zurich. During this interval, while she was under his care, she fell in love with him, expressing a desire to have a child with him. Fearing that his strong emotions for Spielrein might compromise his professional integrity and ruin his marriage, Jung, now the father of three children, asked Freud for advice. Freud, essentially, urged Jung to submit to psychoanalysis. Their correspondence was a landmark in psychoanalysis.

Through re-enactments and readings, Marton fleshes out these events in low-key dramatic fashion. The actors, Eva Osterberg and Lasse Almeback, sensitively portray Spielrein and Jung.

Spielrein decided not to return to Russia after graduating. Spurned by Jung, she wed a Russian Jewish doctor. Freud complimented Spielrein for having weaned herself off a "neurotic dependence" on Jung. But this was cold comfort. Spielrein's marriage was not a happy one. In 1923, at the age of 37, she returned to the Soviet Union to work in child psychology. Much to her disappointment, Stalin, like Hitler, banned psychoanalysis as "a bourgeois perversion." Given the opportunity to leave the Soviet Union, Spielrein demurred. It was her undoing. In August 1942, in Rostov, the Germans murdered Spielrein and her two daughters. Thanks to My Name Was Sabina Spielrein, a serious and empathetic film, she has finally been memorialized.

Another great woman honoured at the festival was Frida Kahlo, the eccentric Mexican artist whose tortured, stylized paintings were once described by her husband, the astonishing muralist Diego Rivera, as "agonized poetry on canvas."

In her first-rate feature film, Frida, Julie Taymor depicts Kahlo – whose father was a German Jew – as a bohemian with a taste for embroidered Mexican blouses and dresses, arresting avant garde art, bisexuality and revolutionary politics. Kahlo, played by the underrated Mexican actress Salma Hayek, whose mesmerizing performance should be the talk of Hollywood, was a liberated, flighty and outspoken person, a ball of fire who stoically endured physical pain for the rest of her life after a bus accident. Convalescing at home, Kahlo passed the time by painting from her bed. In a poignant scene, she throws away her crutches, raises her arms in triumph and walks again. The stuff of genuine drama.

Kahlo's relationship with Rivera, portrayed with panache by Alfred Molina, was a turning point. A womanizer, he promised to be loyal, but not faithful, and he was true to his word. Kahlo grudgingly accepted the bargain, but never reconciled herself to his infidelities.

Frida, which brilliantly evokes the colours, the music, the architecture and the ambience of Mexico, deftly recreates the arc of Kahlo's development: her foray into Mexico City's radical scene, her tumultuous fights with Rivera, her eye-opening trip to Manhattan, her miscarriage, her brief affair with Leon Trotsky (played by Geoffrey Rush) shortly before his assassination and her belated recognition as an artist of originality and aplomb.

Henry Kissinger, the former U.S. secretary of state and national security advisor to several presidents, is the subject of The Trials of Henry Kissinger, a muckraking film based on Christopher Hitchens' polemical book.

In this alternately angry and sardonic documentary, produced by Eugene Jarecki and Alex Gibney, Kissinger is condemned as a war criminal who tolerated Indonesia's savage invasion of East Timor, the U.S. secret bombing campaign in Cambodia and the illegal overthrow of Salvador Allende's democratically elected government in Chile. Claiming that he needlessly sacrificed the lives of tens of thousands of people in the quest of grand strategic goals, they boldly call for his arrest and the convening of a formal inquiry. As might be expected, Kissinger did not respond to their requests for an interview, and so the film is based on archival footage.

Henry Kissinger

Kissinger's formative years, from his birthplace in Germany to his boyhood in New York City's Washington Heights neighbourhood, are quickly dispensed with as the movie segues into more pertinent topics.

His route to power, the ultimate aphrodisiac, was through the futile war in Vietnam. They describe his 1973 Nobel Prize for peace as "a terrible travesty." Kissinger, they argue with some merit, did not bring peace to Vietnam. Indeed, the war lingered on for two more years.

They also claim that the bombing of Cambodia, deliberately concealed from the U.S. Congress, facilitated the rise to power of the murderous Khmer Rouge regime. Their plausible-sounding claims are by turns substantiated and contradicted by Kissinger's detractors and admirers.

Two films about the Arab-Israeli conflict, as seen through the eyes of a Palestinian and an Israeli Arab, were also at the festival.

Ticket to Jerusalem, by Rashid Masharawi, is about an itinerant film projectionist, a Palestinian refugee who travels the West Bank showing vintage cartoons to children.

Jaber's self-respect is challenged by friends, who feel his activities are trivial in light of the Palestinian uprising, and by his father, who advises him to get a "real job" and join his brother, the proprietor of a supermarket, in Canada.

Masharawi depicts Israel's occupation in fairly neutral hues. We see soldiers manning endless checkpoints, tanks and armoured personnel carriers and the white outline of a Jewish settlement on a hill. We also hear about food shortages. Yet the violence of the intifadah is invisible. Masharawi wins points for the Palestinian cause by subtle means. The only instance in which partisan politics intrudes is when Jaber's wife, Sanah, a Red Crescent Society ambulance attendant, talks about her family's desire to go back to their ancestral home in Jaffa.

The pace picks up when a spunky school teacher convinces Jaber to screen his films at her mother's outdoor patio in eastern Jerusalem. Trouble is, Jaber cannot enter Jerusalem without obtaining an Israeli pass. What will he do? Ticket to Jerusalem is modest in scope but clever in execution.

Divine Intervention, which Elia Suleiman describes as "a chronicle of love and pain," is anything but subtle. The film, which takes place in and around Nazareth and is all but bereft of dialogue, consists of a series of random, disconnected tableaux. A man dressed as Santa Claus scurries up a slope, the gifts spilling from his basket. A man in a car curses under his breath. A man waits for a bus that never arrives. A boy kicks a football. An apricot pit causes an Israeli tank to blow up in a fireball. As a car passes a house, it explodes. A beautiful woman turns into a Ninja warrior, downing Israeli helicopters and vanquishing a group of Israeli sharpshooters.

What does it all mean? Suleiman, in this subversive satire, is raising an alarm. The Palestinians, weary of being under the thumb of an occupying army, are reaching their boiling point, like a pressure cooker.

SHORT TAKES: Julie Walking Home, directed by Agnieszka Holland and starring the luminous Miranda Otto, turns on a family crisis during which an intermarried couple try to save their cancer-stricken son. Folk, a quirky short by Canadian Ryan Feldman, is a personal video diary of his parents and grandmother. Jennifer Alleyn's charming Les Rossy is about a canny Montreal Lebanese merchant in the autumn of his long, successful career.

BJCC's Family Place promotes fun, participation

Programs, classes and fun are part of the package the Family Place plans to deliver at the Jewish Discovery Museum.

The family oriented centre, located in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, intends "to promote family participation in a meaningful Jewish context," Bathurst Jewish Community Centre executive director Sherry Kulman said at the opening last week.

In addition to celebrating the holidays and having a Shabbat circle, the Family Place will host a variety of activities, including a staffed drop-in program with informal learning/play centres, outreach to new immigrant families, courses and opportunities for new parents to meet and support each other, pre- and post-natal courses and parent education classes.

In one of its programs, Sarah Chanah Radcliffe will present a lecture on Parenting Tips To Start the New Year off Right on Oct. 22 at 7.30 p.m.

For further information, call 416-636-1880, ext. 390.

The Light Of Israel

Imagine millions of homes brightened by candles shining on the streets outside. Now imagine the warmth of Chanukah in Israel, when the Festival of Lights envelops the entire country. It is, after all, where the holiday originated when Judah led the Maccabean revolt against Roman oppression, restored the Temple to its spiritual state and discovered that a small portion of candle oil, which was supposed to last a day, lasted for eight days instead. Chanukah is a festive time of year, and within this atmosphere of celebration, there's a lot to do across the country.

Celebration of Light, Neot Kedumim – Enjoy hiking trips through ancient olive groves, operate a first-century oil press and make clay oil lamps in this Biblical park, just outside Jerusalem

Torch Run, December 1

Sounds in the Desert, Southern Negev – Celebrate Chanukah with music and sightseeing in Israel's scenic Negev desert region, December 1-5 and check out musical performances in Sde Boker, the home of Israel's first Prime Minister David Ben Gurion.

Now is the time to visit Israel when your presence will make such a significant difference. Contact the Israel Government Tourist Office for a compete list of group missions and individual travel options.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Rabbi Plaut sees age as just another number

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Turning 90 is just another birthday for Rabbi Gunther Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple

His mother, Selma, graduated from University of Toronto with a bachelor's degree at age 100.

"She had barely begun her university studies at my age. I still have a long way to go," he said from his spacious, midtown apartment, several weeks prior to his Nov. 1 birthday.

Rabbi Plaut, author of about 25 books including a commentary on the Torah, is a Companion of the Order of Canada, has a doctorate in international law and holds honorary degrees from University of Toronto and York University.

Age, he says, is a relative matter. "If you continue to work and absorb the beauty of the world around you, you find that age does not necessarily mean getting old."

His home, which he shared with his wife Elizabeth – with whom he has two children, two grandchildren and a great-grandchild on the way – until she was hospitalized with a stroke 2½ years ago, is brimming with antiques that she had collected.

He was married for 61 "wonderful" years, he says, "and then the stroke just took the wind right out of her. She is still as beautiful as ever, though."

He visits her daily, "and I like to think she knows I'm there, but we just can't get into her brain. I would give my last penny to have my wife come home and live with me again."

As senior rabbi at Holy Blossom until he retired about 25 years ago, he did a lot of marriage counselling, and "I saw a lot of different marriages.

"In a happy marriage, two people gladly adjust their habits. You can't turn up the music if your partner wants to sleep. Someone always has to give up something. They must learn to adjust their lives; they're not living alone anymore."

He found counselling very demanding, he says."It's definitely not a time-filler. I was responsible for someone's life. I took it as a great responsibility."

Giving sermons was a highlight of his years as a pulpit rabbi. "I'm a preacher. When I get up there, I start from scratch. I know what I want to say, but I never have a written script. Stage fright is just not part of me."

When he gave this year's Rosh Hashanah sermon at Holy Blossom, "there were 1,100 people, yet there was dead silence when I started to speak. Half of my success is the anticipation of the congregation. I can be brilliant, but if they don't want to listen…"

Rabbi Plaut, who has spoken to audiences from Australia to South Africa, still gets asked to speak, but says he's stopped accepting invitations because travel has become "too much of a hassle."

He was last in Israel on the day of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, "but not by plan. I was on a tour with past chairs of UJA Federation, and we were stuck at the King David Hotel.

"The King David is beautiful, but when you cannot leave a country for you don't know how long, you truly feel stuck. I was never nervous, however; I am too old to get nervous."

Life for him now is full, he says. "I get up at 5 or 5:30 a.m., I still go to my office at the temple, I attend services as a congregant and I've written the first couple of chapters of a novel."

During the winter months, he regularly attends Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program because "I enjoy eating dinner with the street people.

"Many of these people who sleep on the streets have fascinating stories. Some are highly educated but for some reason, life has let them down. They have stumbled someplace. We have to learn to appreciate our life and remember that we could be close to stumbling."

He offers his dinner companions no advice, he says. "That's not up to me. We just talk – maybe about politics, maybe about art, maybe about themselves. Whatever we talk about, they have taught me how they have stood up against misfortune."

Alan Brown 1947 – 2001

Growing up Jewish in small-town Ontario would be enough to turn many kids away from their roots. But for Alan Brown, being different made him a stronger Jew.

Alan was born in 1947 in Kitchener, Ont., into a family that was dedicated to preserving Jewish life in a city with so few Jews. His grandfather Max was a founding member of the local shul and his Uncle Burke served as president. Both his grandmother Bertha and his mother Violet were pillars of the shul sisterhood and the local Hadassah chapter. His father Sholom was a strong supporter of the Jewish world, and Alan and his two sisters Sharon and Janice belonged to local Jewish youth groups.

"Giving to the community is a natural extension of who we are," says Sharon, who has held numerous executive positions with National Council of Jewish Women – Toronto Section, as has Janice. "Alan felt that connection, too."

With such devotion to his heritage, it wasn't surprising that Alan clung to community work long after he left his hometown. He built a solid reputation as a top-notch Toronto-based architect, designer and planner, later flourishing as a developer of industrial and commercial projects.

In the 1970s, Alan took the first of many trips to Israel and in the mid-'80s found a way to merge his many passions – design, travel, and a deep pride in being Jewish. He immersed himself in the Jack Posluns Cultural Centre, a United Israel Appeal project in Ness Ziona named for the late uncle of his wife, Wendy Posluns.

So intrigued was Alan by the notion of Israelis and Canadians working together for the benefit of Israeli society that he became completely invigorated. He soon found himself involved with Project Renewal, a unique urban revitalization program sponsored by the Jewish Agency and UJA Federation that twins Israeli development towns with Diaspora communities for financial backing and expertise. Over the years, Toronto has provided a community centre, sports centre and scholarships for the people of Beit Dagan, and a daycare centre for Kfar Gvirol, both near Tel Aviv.

"When Alan thought of his own kids and then saw how the kids in Israel were benefiting from the work we were doing there, he recognized that we're all part of a larger Jewish world and we have to make life better for everyone," says UIA Federations Canada president-elect Shoel Silver, who went to Israel with Alan many times to consult with their Israeli counterparts on UJA Federation's Project Renewal Committee.

Before long, Alan was traveling to Israel several times a year to discuss ongoing social programs and physical projects, and to check their progress. He eventually became co-chair of the Project Renewal Committee. He was also on the board of trustees and a major fundraiser for the Tourette Syndrome Foundation and a supporter of many worthy charitable institutions including Princess Margaret Hospital.

"So many people go on missions and see things and meet people in a superficial way," says Wendy. "What struck me was that Alan made so many friends on his trips. He inspired people to do better, to think about what they were trying to achieve.

Even when Israeli and Canadian personalities clashed in the boardroom, Alan was the one who managed to keep tensions at bay with his charm and quick wit. Shoel recalls the "creative tension" that existed between the two groups given the cultural differences and egos involved. But rather than submit to the views of Israeli committee members simply because he didn't live in the country he was helping to build, Alan always managed to get his point across without intimidating his Israeli colleagues. That's because he understood the responsibility of putting donors' money to good use, says Sheol.

"Alan had strong views but his style was such that he was able to get them across without appearing hard-nosed," he says. "Consequently, he made very close friendships that lasted a long time."

Even as Alan's health began to falter in 1998, he continued to inspire his three young children – Matthew, Evan and Leah – to love life and embrace their heritage. He spent his last few months keeping a journal, a living will to his family and friends detailing his ethics, his insights and his hopes. It's a treasured memento of a man who made a tremendous difference for so many in such a short time.

Judaism more open to dissent than ever before, prof claims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Judaism has moved from exclusivism to inclusivism, a Hebrew University philosopher told a recent two-day University of Toronto conference on Israel and the Diaspora.

"For the first time in Jewish history, all options are open," said Aviezer Ravitzky, a renowned authority on Jewish thought and a winner of the Israel Prize.

He described the transformation as "Judaism by dissent," a development from "determinism to voluntarism" that has occurred only in the past three generations.

In a departure from tradition, contemporary Judaism now tolerates all forms of Jewish expression, from Chassidism to Reform Judaism, he claimed.

Even secularism and assimilation are tolerated by the new Judaism, said Ravitzky, whose books run the gamut from Religious and Secular in Israel: A Cultural War? to Messianism, Zionism and Jewish Religious Radicalism.

In today's climate, he added, secular Jews and atheists are also part of what he called Klal Yisrael.

Nonetheless, he acknowledged, Judaism is beset by cleavages.

As an example, he cited the biblical King David. For secular Zionists, he is a hero writ large. But for haredim, he is merely a mythical figure.

"We're still quarrelling about our past," Ravitzky observed.

Speaking about the looming clash of civilizations between radical Islam and the West, he said that Israel and Jews have essentially cast their lot with the Christian camp, as led by the United States.

For 3,000 years, Jews were careful not to identify themselves with either side during such historical upheavals.

But now, in an unprecedented event, Jews have aligned themselves with the Western, Christian side, he said.

Expressing concern about these budding alliances, Ravitzky suggested they may yet backfire on the Jewish world.

"We may have a billion potential enemies," he declared, referring to Islamic countries like Indonesia, whose Muslim population exceeds that of the Arab world.

The conference Ravitzky and other scholars participated in took place at the Munk Centre for International Studies, and was sponsored by its Halbert Exchange Program.

Among the academics who took part were Israel Bartal and Dan Avnon of Hebrew University and David Novak and Derek Penslar of the University of Toronto.

A night of Yiddish songs, humour

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It is the language that in many ways encapsulates European Jewish culture.

To celebrate it and contribute to its continuity, the 36th Yiddishland Café event was held last Sunday evening, Oct. 6, as more than 100 people came to the Toronto Workmen's Circle to listen to hilarious Yiddish stories and treasured songs.

"What we want is for people to experience the beauty of Yiddish through songs and stories," said Henia Reinhartz, who, along with husband Nochem, helped organize the latest incarnation of the Yiddishland Café, which is now in its seventh season.

"We hope this will inspire people to want to learn more."

Under the theme "let us laugh, let us sing," the audience was delighted by poetic Yiddish tunes performed by singer-guitarist Yeva and pianist Nina Shapilsky, as well as by classic Yiddish stories about the Wise Men of Chelm, as told by stage actor and director Nathan Garnick.

Garnick had the crowd in stitches as he recounted how Chelm's inhabitants planned the construction of a cemetery by having every man, woman and child lie down on the ground to be measured, to determine the cemetery's size.

"If you take it as a joke, it's fun," said Garnick of the ribbing that Chelm has taken since Jews settled there about 500 years ago.

The community once boasted 7,615 Jewish residents and can be likened to Canada's Newfoundland, the reluctant butt of others' jokes.

Toronto-born Garnick, 82, has been performing in Yiddish for more than 40 years and revels in his audience's pleasure.

"These are the stories the people of my generation are nostalgic about," said Garnick.

"I do this to keep the language of Yiddish alive."

Garnick said when he first started performing, his act was exclusively in Yiddish. Today, he sprinkles his shtick with English to make it "intelligible for today's audiences."

While Yiddish was once the mother tongue of millions of Jews, its speakers are declining rapidly.

But Reinhartz said the café is one small part of a Yiddish revival that has swept North America and Europe.

"There is a tremendous comeback to Yiddish," said Reinhartz, noting that the University of Toronto, Oxford University in England and New York's Columbia University all have Yiddish classes.

Reinhartz said she does her part to keep Yiddish fresh by speaking to her six grandchildren in a language that encompasses "1,000 years of our creativity."

Sylvia Kerman said she came with her husband Frank to the Yiddishland Café out of a desire to rekindle a Yiddish flame in her family. "We're the last people in our family to speak Yiddish," Kerman said. "Hopefully, we'll speak to our grandkids in Yiddish. We'll do everything we can to help it flourish."

The next Yiddishland Café is scheduled for Dec. 15 and will include a performance by Klezmer band Beyond the Pale.

Torontonian wins Israel's Olympics of the Mind

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

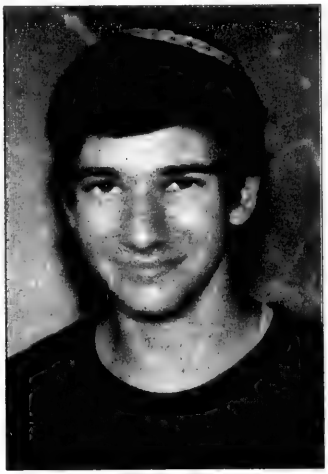
Raphael Rush was in his element this summer at the 14th annual OlympiYeda science contest held annually in Haifa. "I enjoy science a lot," said the 15-year-old winner of the prestigious competition for students entering Grades 9 and 10, sponsored by Israel's National Museum of Science.

The Grade 10 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto won top honours in the contest, including a cash prize plus a full scholarship for his first year of studies at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

One of 25 North American teens and 25 Israelis to reach the semi-finals after two rounds of testing locally, Rush also plays the flute, is on student council and has an interest in electronics and cryptography (the science of codes).

Semi-finalists won a 20-day trip to Israel, which was split between touring and a science component that culminated in a nationally televised competition for eight finalists. Because this year's theme (and the topic for the projects) was Science in the Service of Police Investigations, students spent a day at the Israel Police Academy learning about crime-solving methods from forensic experts.

Rush's project explored whether it is possible to falsify fingerprints. He concluded that some day fingerprints may not be accepted as valid biometric evidence. "Today, they're generally accepted as extremely valid."



Raphael Rush

Canada was well-represented at the OlympiYeda, with 10 students who made it to the semi-finals in Israel.

Toronto-area participants included David Zvi Epstein, the only other Canadian finalist, and Sam Chippin and Hillel Nadler, both of whom earned certificates of distinction. Other Toronto-area participants were Rafi Frydman-Kohl, Jonathan Goldfarb, Eric Kaplovitch, Brahm Klar and Avi Libman. Peleg Bartfield of Vancouver also earned a certificate of distinction.

Rush, a second-time entrant who wrote the qualifying tests for the 2001 OlympiYeda when he was a student at Netivot Hatorah, had been in Israel twice before and said he was excited to have the opportunity to return.

His mother, Andrea, who travelled to Israel for the competition as part of a contingent of North American parents, noted that her grandmother had been an early volunteer fund-raiser for the Canadian Technion Society.

The Israel National Museum of Science is housed in the original Technion building. Rush said he was impressed by the university, especially its robotics lab.

In a statement, organizers said they were pleased to have enough interest from parents of North American participants to organize a parent mission to Israel. Zvi Jankelowitz, executive director of the American Friends of the Israel National Museum of Science, based in Newton, Mass., said in the release that the "interest and participation by a record number of parents and teens was most gratifying… It was a dramatic demonstration of our solidarity with the people of Israel during these trying times, when they are trying to carry on their lives as normally as possible."

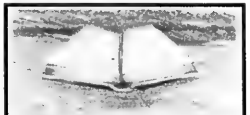
Jewish Life

A lesson in equal treatment

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

Rabbi Israel Kagan, commonly known by the title of his famous work Chafetz Chaim, was a Polish rabbi and scholar of the late 19th and early 20th centuries who was universally revered for his piety and concern for his fellow human beings.

The Chafetz Chaim was once travelling on a train studying a religious text. Alongside him sat three Jews playing cards. They had also, it seems, been drinking schnapps. The three men wanted a fourth hand for their game and asked the stranger sitting next to them to join them. The Chafetz Chaim politely refused, explaining that he preferred to continue studying. But the frustrated card players refused to take no for an answer. They beat the poor rabbi and left him bleeding on the floor.

Hours later, the train pulled into the station. Hundreds of people swarmed the platform waiting to greet the great sage. Many in the crowd held signs welcoming the Chafetz Chaim.

The three Jews who had not long before attacked the man sitting in their coach – now revealed as one of the rabbinical giants of their time – watched in horror. Profoundly ashamed, they managed to wade through the people and find the rabbi. They begged for forgiveness and poured out their feelings of shame and remorse. But the Chafetz Chaim refused to forgive them. Although it seemed incomprehensible, the three Jews assumed it was too soon for the rabbi to forgive them. He probably needed more time to get over the hurt. They would try again at a more opportune moment.

Several weeks passed and the three wangled an appointment to see the Chafetz Chaim. Once again, they pleaded their case and begged for forgiveness. But Rabbi Kagan was adamant. He would not accept their apology.

Rabbi Kagan's son, who was present as this strange scene played itself out, was taken aback by his father's behaviour. It was unlike anything he had seen his father do before. Why would his father act with such cruelty and persist in tormenting these people?

The son decided to ask his father to explain his actions. The Chafetz Chaim explained that, of course, he wanted to forgive the three men and he would have done so at the railroad station if it were in his power to do so. He did forgive them for their assault. When they learned the true identity of their victim, they were mortified at what they had done. But the man they beat up was the one they presumed to be a simple, unassuming poor person with no crowd of well-wishers waiting to greet him. The Chafetz Chaim told his son that this man was the victim and only he could grant them forgiveness. Let them go find that person. He would be the only one capable of releasing them from their guilt.

In this, the Chafetz Chaim teaches us a great lesson. We rush to give kavod to the esteemed and the powerful; we are quick to seek forgiveness from the great and the renowned. Yet these are not authentic examples of granting forgiveness or praise. These are not true reflections of a yiddishe neshamah. A yiddishe neshamah can only manifest themselves in the way we treat other people who are not famous, important or wealthy. It can only be seen in the way we interact with that simple, unassuming poor person, for he, too, possesses the dignity and honour of having been created in the image of God.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Judaism is the world's longest running revolution. A well known rabbinic tale about Judaism's first hero – the patriarch Abraham – sharply illustrates the ancient perception that belief in God was the original form of cultural resistance.

In the story, Abraham is assigned by his father, Terach, to tend to the family store for a day. The business, as many a contemporary PR firms might appreciate, is that of selling idols – gods of all shapes and sizes. Indeed, in the midrash, Terach is called an oved tzelamim, literally an "image worshipper," an exemplary model of Plato's warning about confusing shadow with reality. Terach is the quintessential postmodern, manufacturing idols that he then has the culturally approved audacity to pawn off as being worthy of worship.

It turns out that Abraham is not cut out for daddy's trade, practically badgering customers regarding their myopic investment in his father's creation of figures of wood and stone. In the story's conclusion, Abraham destroys all the idols save the biggest one, and places a stick into its hands. The implication – that one idol decimated the rest – is so ludicrous as to strain even Terach's sense of credulity.

Employing an ancient version of "No Way!" Terach exclaims, "Do you think me a fool? I just made this idol yesterday."

Abraham's rejoinder checkmates not just his father, but the whole pagan negation of the rational: "Do my father's ears hear my father's words?"

I have always been intrigued by Abraham's final question to his father. Jewish sources convey that Abraham was well into adulthood at the time of his encounter, but something about his actions seem quintessentially adolescent in a contemporary sense. Forced to work by his father in an environment he hates, Abraham finally rebels aggressively. But the final question is still a plea, still an attempt to get his dad's attention.

Freud argues that we spend our lives trying to fix the past, sometimes hoping against hope that if we try hard enough that Mom will change, or that Dad can be redeemed. Don't you hear what you stand for, Dad? Don't you see how groundless your worldview is? And this is what you want me to inherit? Amid the smashed fragments of idolatrous wood and clay lie the son's enormous disappointment and the eternal drive to reclaim the past.

We talk about this in my class. But my students have dibs on the final irony, because today it is Judaism that is the unchosen inheritance, the ideology forcibly bequeathed on a restless next generation. Can a religion be loved if it is imposed? Conversely, will it be embraced if it is optional? This paradox has a Zen flavour – the more you squeeze it, the more it vanishes – but its poignancy is felt by parents of all faiths trying to pass on some of their essential religious beliefs and practices.

I wonder what bothers Abraham more – to believe his father is enraptured by idols or to discover that dad is totally aware of the bankruptcy of such a position? Is it better if his father is a naive fool or a cynical opportunist? Are the idols for business or belief? And with more questions than answers, another lesson concludes.

Jewish Life

Telling the story of a language

Yiddish: A Nation of Words*, by Miriam Weinstein, Random House, 2002, $22.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The changes I have witnessed in the world of Yiddish during my lifetime have been disheartening. My parents, immigrants to the United States from Eastern Europe, spoke Yiddish as well as Russian, and eventually learned English.

At the yeshiva I attended 70 years ago, the Chumash we studied was translated into Yiddish. One of my bar mitzvah speeches was in Yiddish, a fairly obscure and learned discourse written by my father that I memorized. Members of the congregation, if not edified, were impressed. The other speech, in English, more conventional in nature, raised few eyebrows.

My children know Hebrew, but apart from a few popular words and phrases, almost no Yiddish. As far as my grandchildren are concerned – forget it.

Isaac Bashevis Singer, winner of the Nobel Prize for literature (1978), put Yiddish on the world's cultural map and made it respectable. But even he, who once said "in Jewish life, [Yiddish is] a long way between being sick and dead," saw the ominous handwriting on the wall.

History, of course, played a series of ugly tricks on the language. The Holocaust wiped out half of the world's Yiddish speakers, and Stalin expunged another large segment – including a galaxy of brilliant Yiddish writers. Perhaps the most crushing blow was the inevitable Jewish cultural and linguistic assimilation to English in North America.

Between the two great wars, Yiddish struggled valiantly for its existence. In America, the Yiddish press and periodicals had a combined circulation of 800,000. More than 1,000 books in Yiddish were published annually. In New York, there were 12 full-time Yiddish theatres.

Miriam Weinstein, once a documentary filmmaker and now a freelance journalist, wrote this book, she says, "to strengthen the golden chain of continuity." She tells her readers: "I have written history-as-story, filling the tale with flesh-and-blood people with obsessive humour, visionary courage, brilliant desperate causes, and glorious flaws. As will immediately be obvious, I am a journalist, not a historian, linguist, or any kind of scholar. I did my research – meeting mavens, experts; working my way through lights-on-timers library stacks – as a yederer, an everyman."

The author is enthusiastic and warmly sentimental, addicted to comforting jokes and apt epigrams. Each of the book's 20 chapters offers a snapshot of the language in a given historical framework.

She provides a "cast of characters" from the 11th century to our own time who have been involved in decisive turning points in the evolution of Yiddish.

By the end of the 19th century, Yiddish had become the language that Jews in Eastern Europe learned first. It was during this period that Yiddish literature enjoyed its first great flowering, when such luminaries as Shalom Aleichem and Yitzhak Leib Peretz produced masterworks drawing on the renowned descriptive nuances of Yiddish, particularly when it came to assessments of human character.

Weinstein's book, written in a popular style, is warmly recommended to readers who want a loving, serious, readable chronicle of a 1,000-year-old saga. It's ironic, however, as a recent critic pointed out, that it's not likely to be published in Yiddish translation.

4,000 Israelis & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The World Wide Web has always been a breeding ground for conspiracy theories. One of those biggest theories has been reverberating throughout the Internet since last year's Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The claim: that 4,000 Israelis did not show up for work on that Tuesday in September because they had been warned that Israel was planning an attack on the World Trade Center. Today, a look at the source of the rumour, the damage it continues to cause and the efforts being made to set the record straight.

The story first surfaced on the Internet one week after the attacks and quoted a report from Lebanon's Al-Manar television. There were actually three claims: that 4,000 Israelis didn't show up for work; that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was prevented from travelling to New York by an unnamed "Zionist organization"; and that the FBI arrested five Israelis four hours after the World Trade Center attacks. Slate Magazine was one of the first sites to report and debunk the story under the headline, "4,000 Jews, 1 Lie: Tracking an Internet hoax" [http://slate.msn.com/?id= 116813].

Two of the most comprehensive examinations of the allegation were conducted by the Anti-Defamation League [http://www.adl. org/911/israel. asp] and by a site called Nocturne Research [http://www.nocturne.org/~terry/wtc_4000_Israeli.ht ml].

Nocturne explains how early news reports were seized upon as the basis for these rumours. For example, the day after Sept. 11, the Jerusalem Post reported that "Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem has so far received the names of 4,000 Israelis believed to have been in the areas of the World Trade Center and the Pentagon at the time of the attack" [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/09/12/News/News.34692.html].

The CBS News Web site continues the story. "Then on Sept. 17 in Beirut, al Manar, a television station controlled by the radical Islamic group Hezbollah, aired the full fantasy for the first time. Billed as a special investigative report, al Manar claimed that 4,000 Israelis employed at the World Trade Center had not shown up for work on Sept. 11... In just a matter of days, one falsehood piled on top of another and passed on to audiences around the globe had produced 'the big lie' – a lie now accepted as fact throughout the Muslim world" [http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2002/09/04/60II/main5207 68.shtml].

The TruthOrFiction site examines all kinds of urban myths, from The Neiman-Marcus Cookie that Cost a Bundle (Fiction) to the Sea Creature Found on the Shores of Nova Scotia (Truth) [http://www.truthorfiction.com]. About the 4,000 Israelis theory, the site says, "Nothing in this report fits with any of the facts that are known about the terrorist attacks" [http://www.truthorfiction.com/rumors/wtcisraelis.htm].

But despite the debunking, the allegations are still out there. The ShiaNews site carries a report about an anonymous U.S. military source's memo "that points to the Israeli Mossad intelligence service having links to the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks" [http://www.shianews.com/hl/americas/news_id/000016 6.php].

What impact have these reports had? Just weeks after the attacks, a Gallup International poll revealed that 48 per cent of Pakistanis believed Israel was responsible [http://www.msnbc.com/news/644738.asp?cp1=1]. And last February, a larger poll conducted in several Muslim countries, including Indonesia, Iran, Kuwait, Lebanon, Pakistan and Turkey, revealed that 18 per cent believe the Arabs are responsible for the attacks while 61 per cent do not [http://www.usatoday.com/news/attack/2002/02/27/usat-pollresults.htm].

But the story of the 4,000 Israelis isn't only having an effect in the Middle East. New Jersey's state poet laureate Amiri Baraka [http://www.poets.org/poets/poets.cfm?prmID=458] recently stirred controversy with his poem "Somebody Blew Up America." It reads, in part: "Who knew the World Trade Center was gonna get bombed/ Who told 4000 Israeli workers at the Twin Towers/ To stay home that day/ Why did Sharon stay away?" [http://diversity.uoregon.edu/SomebodyBlewUpAmerica.htm].

When the New York Times asked Baraka to explain his allegations, he responded: "Everything said about Israel in the poem is easily researched" [http://shlk.com/190].

Dershowitz defends Israel

Recently, Harvard University President Lawrence Summers spoke out forcefully against increasingly loud calls at the university to cut off all ties with Israel. Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, in the open letter below, responded strongly on behalf of both Israel and Summers.

By Alan M. Dershowitz

In my 38 years of teaching at Harvard Law School, I don't recall ever writing in praise of any action by a Harvard president, but this time I must congratulate President Lawrence H. Summers for his willingness to say out loud what many of us in the Harvard community have long believed: namely, that singling out Israel, among all the countries in the world for divestment is an action which is anti-Semitic in effect, if not in intent. A recent open letter by one of the signatories made it clear that he regards Israel as the "pariah" state, a word historically used by anti-Semites to characterize the Jewish people.

"...To single out the Jewish State of Israel...is bigotry, pure and simple..."

As an advocate and practitioner of human rights throughout the world, I can confidently assert that Israel's record on human rights is among the best, especially among nations that have confronted comparable threats. Though far from perfect, Israel has shown extraordinary concern for avoiding civilian casualties in its half-century effort to protect its civilians from terrorism. Jordan killed more Palestinians in a single month than Israel has between 1948 and the present.

Israel has the only independent judiciary in the entire Middle East. Its Supreme Court, one of the most highly regarded in the world, is the only court in the Middle East from which an Arab or a Muslim can expect justice, as many have found in winning dozens of victories against the Israeli government, the Israeli military and individual Israeli citizens.

There is no more important component in the protection of human rights and civil liberties than an independent judiciary willing to stand up to its own government. Let the proponents of divestment name a court in any Arab or Muslim country that is comparable to the Israeli Supreme Court.

"Israel's record on human rights is among the best..."

Israel is the only country in the region that has virtually unlimited freedom of speech. Any person in Israel whether Jewish, Muslim or Christian can criticize the Israeli government and its leaders. No citizen of any other Middle Eastern or Muslim state can do that without fear of imprisonment or death.

Israel is the only country that has openly confronted the difficult issue of protecting the civil liberties of the ticking bomb terrorist. The Israeli Supreme Court recently ruled that despite the potential benefits of employing non-lethal torture to extract information, the tactic is illegal. Brutal torture, including lethal torture, is commonplace in nearly every other Middle Eastern and Muslim country. Indeed, American authorities sometimes send suspects to Egypt, Jordan and the Philippines precisely because they know that they will be tortured in those countries.

There are, of course, difficult issues to be resolved in the Middle East. These include the future of the settlements, the establishment of Palestinian self-governance and the prevention of terrorism. These issues will require compromise on all sides. Members of the Harvard community must be free to criticize Israel when they disagree with its policies or actions, as they criticize any other country in the world whose record is not perfect. But to single out the Jewish State of Israel, as if it were the worst human rights offender, is bigotry pure and simple.

Let me propose an alternative to singling out Israel for divestment: let Harvard choose nations for investment in the order of their human rights records. If that were done, investment in Israel would increase dramatically, while investments in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, Philippines, Indonesia, the Palestinian Authority and most other countries of the world would decrease markedly.

Frum Toronto to Washington

Former U.S. presidential speech writer, Toronto's David Frum, returned to his hometown last week for a keynote address to UJA Federation's leading supporters. Frum made a special appearance in Toronto on Sunday, October 6 at the UJA Federation Major Gifts Dinner.

From January 2001 to February 2002, Frum served as assistant to George Bush for economic speechwriting.

Canada's relationship with Israel

• "This Canadian government has condemned both Palestinian murder and Israel's response to murder. It calls itself a friend of Israel and then joins the UN lynch mob. Canada has made contributions to the war on terrorism – I won't deny that. But, its contributions, for the most part, have been grudging, tardy, and inadequate. This government has not been much of a friend to the United States or to Israel, not much of a friend to the endangered Jewish community."

The U.S. relationship with Israel

• "If best friends show their friendship when friendship is most needed, then we can justly say that George W. Bush has been the best friend to Israel in the presidency since Harry Truman."

• "From the beginning of his administration, Bush refused to meet with Arafat, or talk to him on the telephone. Arafat was so stunned by the shutout that when Bush came to speak at the UN last November, he actually tried to physically shove his way into Bush's presence to shake hands for the cameras. He had to actually be physically blocked from doing so by the Secret Service."

David Frum

The White House: Post 9-11

• "When President Bush decided on September 11 to define the war on terrorism as a war, and defined the enemy as all terrorism of global reach, he committed himself to a policy that left no room for Arafat, the man who invented terrorism of global reach."

• "On June 24, 2002, President Bush gave a speech in the White House rose garden that threw two decades of American foreign policy out the window and a speech that the Middle East never thought they'd hear. Bush announced that the United States would have nothing to do with the Palestinian Authority until, and unless, the Palestinians elected democratic leaders untainted by terror."

Doctors, dentists call on Israel

More than 30 medical and dental professionals from Toronto are now in Israel to make a unique house call.

Members of the week-long UJA Federation Medical-Dental Israel Solidarity Mission, who left on October 13th are not only showing their support for Israel, but are also learning about how medical experts handle trauma.

"Israel's hospitals and her standards of medical care are first class," says Dr. Howard Price, Chair of the mission along with Drs. Irv Gottesman, Zion Sasson, and Bradley Strauss.

The seven-day sojourn to Israel includes a meeting with Israel's surgeon general and workshops at Laniado Hospital in Netanya on, among other topics, disaster medicine, and the West Nile virus.

UJA Federation recently donated $125,000 for Laniado's trauma unit in addition to funding similar trauma units across Israel, especially in those areas hard hit by terrorism.

"We're not just going to study trauma, but everyday medicine as well, be it obstetrics or heart surgery," adds Price. "Remember, it is still a solidarity mission and I personally feel that we – now more than ever – should be going to Israel."

Beverley and Elliott Lyons

In what promises to be an emotional afternoon, the group will have lunch with the relatives and friends of the victims who were killed in the Pesach massacre by a suicide bomber at the Park Hotel.

Another mission heading to Israel this year is the UJA Federation Family Mission which takes place between December 22 and January 2.

Participants, who will spend three days in Jerusalem and six in Eilat, will take part in a memorial service for the victims of June's bombing at the Hebrew University.

The Chairs of this mission, Beverley and Elliott Lyons, devised an itinerary that makes the mission a trip with a purpose. There is something for everyone, including a jeep ride through the Negev, snorkeling in Eilat, and a visit to the Dead Sea. Participants will also hear a variety of expert speakers to gain a unique perspective on Israel's current situation.

"This is the perfect family trip," adds Lyons. "Remember, Florida and Mexico can wait. Israel can't."

Advocacy group marks its 30th anniversary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the ultra-competitive world of Jewish organizational advocacy, Bert Raphael runs a small shop.

While many are familiar with Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada – the heavy hitters in the field – fewer have heard of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada or its sister organization, Canadian Lawyers & Jurists for World Jewry (CLJWJ), of which Raphael serves as president and chair, respectively.

Headquartered in Raphael's downtown law office, CLJWJ is marking its 30th anniversary this year. At its inception in 1972, it was called Canadian Lawyers & Jurists for Soviet Jewry, reflecting its primary focus at the time. The Educational Foundation was created seven years later as the organization's charitable arm.

While the CLJWJ's mandate has shifted in the intervening years from advocacy for Soviet Jews to the broader constituency of "world Jewry," it retains its educational function and it provides what assistance it can – largely on the strength of its reputation – to Jews experiencing discrimination, Raphael said.

Helps Jews experiencing discrimination

Most of the organization's efforts are focused on letter-writing to various media outlets and arranging for high profile speakers to address a sophisticated audience of business leaders and professionals, most often during lunches in office boardrooms.

It's a modest profile but one that has seen Raphael tackle some of the most vexing issues besetting the Jewish community and one which promises further years of new challenges for Raphael and his small group of partners in the two organizations.

As a keen observer of the political scene, Raphael was quick off the mark recently with letters to the Star and the Globe and Mail to voice concerns over the "Concordia issue," which saw Arab protesters prevent former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking at the Montreal university.

A human rights advocate for years, Raphael bristles at the strong-arm tactics employed by the anti-Israel protesters, which included smashing a plate glass window and assaulting elderly Jews trying to enter the lecture hall.

"If it was foreign students who did that, they should be out," he said. "If they're Canadian students, I see them being a real dangerous threat to becoming terrorist cells... If they can attack a rabbi and his wife, they're dangerous people."

Much of his energy is now directed at "the Israel issue," which he said "won't go away."

A litigator with specialities in insurance and medical malpractice claims, Raphael said he has written to organizations that represent Arab lawyers and jurists in Ramallah, attempting to establish cordial relations and "get a better understanding of the two nations, living side by side."

He has also e-mailed an Islamic Centre in Toronto, hoping to find a domestic Arab lawyer's group similar to his own. Raphael said he was disappointed in not receiving replies to either inquiry.

Bert Raphael

Arranging for speakers is a main function of the Educational Foundation, and the list of those who have addressed the group is impressive.

In the early years, Emmett Hall spoke about his experiences in the Soviet Union, as did Willard Estey, both of whom went on to serve on the Supreme Court of Canada. Beverley McLaughlin, now Chief Justice of the SCC, discussed a more recent visit to Israel and her encounters with that country's legal establishment. Other prominent jurists to speak were Justices Alvin Rosenberg, Ted Matlow and Roy McMurtry, now chief justice of Ontario. Former Attorney General Ian Scott and law professor and MP Irwin Cotler also addressed the group's luncheon meetings.

CLJWJ started in 1972

Deschenes, and Israeli lawyer Avraham Tory, who described the horrors of concentration camps in Kovno, Lithuania.

Raphael asserts the speaking engagements, though tiny by community standards, are important in that the listeners include important figures in the legal and business communities. "We want to inform people of influence," he said.

The CLJWJ got its start when Raphael and Sam Filer, later to become a judge, visited the Soviet Union during Simchat Torah, 1972. They were startled when dozens of Jews surrounded them, asking for news about conditions in Canada and saying, "'you're from Canada. Help us leave, don't forget us.'"

"If we needed any inspiration, that was it," Raphael said.

Moved by what they had seen, and not deterred by the KGB men who dogged them during their stay, they created the Soviet Jewry advocacy group on their return.

Assisted by the late Arthur Maloney and McMurtry, they recruited 700 lawyers and judges to provide the organization with critical mass and some credibility. With the names of all 700 on the back of their stationery, their letters demanded immediate respect. Ambassadors, newspaper editors and politicians were targeted by the letter-writers as the group joined a massive effort to keep the plight of Soviet Jews at the top of the international diplomatic agenda.

As time passed and Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate and practice their faith, the group expanded its focus to other issues.

At 68 and with a thriving legal practice, Raphael has no plans to slow down. "I love what I do," he said, adding he has served as campaign chair of the JNF-Negev Dinner and as co-chair of the Reena Foundation's recent Answering the Challenge gala dinner.

Raphael has turned down offers to merge the CLJWJ with B'nai Brith, opting to maintain close control (along with several others) over the group's future.

And there are no shortage of neglected issues he feels need airing.

Jews have served as Chief Justices in five provinces – British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia – and many others sit on their province's Courts of Appeal. Yet only one, Bora Laskin, has been appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada. "Why are there not more on the Supreme Court?" he asks. No doubt a letter on that point will be in the mail sometime soon.

Marathon runner to aid Laniado Hospital

By LEILA SPEISMAN

The Canadian International Marathon, to be held in Toronto Oct. 20, will benefit others in addition to improving the health and fitness of its participants.

Mark Benson, a journalist and production manager for Eric Cohen Books, a publisher of English-language school text books, who now lives in Netanya, is coming to Toronto to take part in the 42-km run. He has chosen to donate sponsorship money he raises to buy equipment for the pediatric trauma unit at Laniado Hospital's new children's hospital.

The only hospital in the Netanya area, Laniado serves more than a quarter of a million people. It has the only emergency department open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Because of its location in the centre of the country, it is part of the Israel Defence Force's strategic arrangements for the multi-injured and chemical warfare victims.

Benson told The CJN that while he has had no personal contact with Laniado, he felt that as it was his local hospital, it would be an appropriate focus for his fund-raising efforts. He has set a personal target of $10,000 to purchase a premature baby incubator.

Benson, who was born in London, England, made aliyah with his wife Jackie in 1989. His three children were born in Israel, the oldest, he said, on the eve of the Gulf War.

Although he had not been exercising very much for a few years, the death of a friend four years ago of colon cancer at the young age of 36 gave Benson the impetus he needed to return to a fixed exercise regime, he said.

His training has been "standard for a marathon – many many months in all weather conditions, including temperatures of 90 degrees celsius and 80 per cent humidity during the Israeli summer."

At the peak of his training, he was covering 50 km a week.

This will be his fourth marathon, he said. The others were in London and Glasgow in 1985, both for charity, and in Tiberias in 1997.

Impressed by Benson's determination and generosity, orthopedic surgeon Reuven Lexier, a member of the board of directors of Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, has put together a relay team to join Benson on his run. The team will also contribute their sponsorship money to the incubator.

For more information, call Noreen Azoulay, executive director, Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, Ontario Region, at 416-785-8946.

Mideast crisis presented using theories of objectivism

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Israel is essentially the only moral country in the Middle East, says Yaron Brook, executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute in Irvine, Calif.

In a recent lecture at the University of Toronto, Brook discussed the Middle East crisis using the theories of objectivism or the supremacy of reason – the school of philosophical thought founded by novelist and essayist Ayn Rand.

"Israel represents a triumph of freedom in the Middle East. Israel stands for the principle of progress. This is what makes Israel a moral country: it's pro-life, pro-freedom, pro-reason," Brook said.

"[Israel's] founders created a free country in a region dominated by totalitarian, corrupt, despotic regimes," said Brook, who presented what he described as a moral argument for supporting Israel.

Born and raised in Israel, and educated at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology – and at the University of Texas (Austin), Brook has appeared on university campuses across North America, as well as on CNN, Fox, and MSNBC, promoting his pro-Israel campaign.

Speaking for over an hour, Brook presented strong, if controversial, arguments about the West, America's role in the Middle East conflict, Israel and the Palestinians.

Brook used Ayn Rand's theories to support his claims throughout his lecture, as well as during a two-hour question and answer session. For example, Brook said what he referred to as "Arab aggression" was typical of Rand's theory of "the hatred of the good for being the good."

"They hate the Israelis," he argued, "not because of their vices, but because of their virtues – their ability to better their lives by embracing reason, science, technology and individual rights."

Brook also challenged the West's attitude toward Israel: "Europe and much of the rest of the world have, at least since 1967, become increasingly hostile to Israel, and increasingly sympathetic to its enemies. The West is in the process of abandoning its one bastion in the Middle East."

From the perspective of objectivism, according to which everyone should act in his own best interest, Brook said that America should be more supportive of Israel. "America has not done enough to support Israel. America has been half-hearted in its support of Israel… It is in America's and in the West's own self-interest to support Israel unequivocally against its Arab and Palestinian enemies… America's self-defence is intimately connected with that of Israel."

Some of Brook's more contentious arguments included his views on the creation of a Palestinian state. In his opinion, objectivism insists that only countries founded upon western notions, where the state, for example, recognizes every individual's right to freedom in all senses, have a right to exist. Because the Palestinians do not follow these ideas, Brook argued, they are not entitled to their own nation at this point in time.

Brook concluded by offering a solution to the Middle East conflict, rooted in the objectivist philosophy: "Uncompromising commitment to freedom and to western values is the most powerful weapon we possess. Ultimately, peace will come to the Arab world, to the Middle East, only when they adopt western values.

"Until the Arab populace is free, free of political enslavement by their own governments and free of the mysticism of Islamic fundamentalism, no peace is possible. Only when the Arab world experiences the equivalent of the Renaissance, the rediscovery of reason, will it rise above its Middle Ages culture."

two daughters in their twenties, have travelled through Europe and North America, including to the U.S. Congress and State Department, in their quest to learn the soldiers' fate and press for action. They also speak to groups in Israel, including schoolchildren and new olim.

On behalf of all three families, they urge people to write to Kofi Annan, secretary general of the United Nations, to U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, to the European Parliament in Brussels, and to their governments in other countries.

Avraham, an Israeli air force veteran who served more than 24 years before retiring, said his current employer at a municipal union has given him as much time off as he needs.

Despite his personal tribulations, Avraham still believes the route to peace lies in talking to the Palestinians. At the same time, he noted, "we need to fight against the terror and the Islamic world that won't accept us."

Until the kidnapping, he took part in Friday afternoon pro-peace events as a founding member of Mishmarot HaShalom (Guardians of the Peace), whose members gathered weekly near the site of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination to read and sing songs before Shabbat began. The movement was established following Rabin's 1995 assassination.

In his speech, Avraham criticized the UN, which he said has withheld information about the kidnappings that took place in sight of a UN checkpoint. He also criticized Amnesty International and other non-governmental organizations for their critical attitudes toward Israel.

His message for the Jewish community here, he told The CJN, was the importance of being united, both as a community and in support of Israel.

Edna, who leaves the public speaking to Haim because he has a better command of English, said she dislikes politics.

Sometimes, she and the Arab nurses with whom she works speculate on how the situation might be different. "They ask me, and I ask them, if we had no government, no Palestinian Authority, no politicians, [just] the people in the street… we would live very well."

Hamilton rabbi being honoured for 45 years of service

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Reflecting on his 45-year involvement with Adas Israel Synagogue in Hamilton, Rabbi Mordechai Green attributes his accomplishments to the freedom he was given.

"I never tried to curtail my imagination or my dreams," Rabbi Green said in an interview. "If I wanted to undertake a project, there was nothing stopping me.

"I had complete freedom to do fund-raising. I did not have to get approval from the congregation. However, I did not ask the congregation or the board to underwrite the projects. I took it upon myself to get contributions."

Rabbi Green, who became rabbi emeritus of Adas Israel in February when his son, Rabbi Daniel Green, assumed the position of spiritual leader, noted that he established two principles regarding fund-raising.

"The first is that we should not establish a type of finance committee that approaches the shul as a business. Secondly, charity must be voluntary and must emerge from a person's commitment.

"My philosophy was that everyone could join the shul, no matter what they could afford to pay, or what they wanted to pay in dues… I would establish a relationship with the family, and eventually they would want to lend their support to a particular project."

Adas Israel Synagogue has grown and flourished since 1958, when Rabbi Green became the spiritual leader of the small Cannon Street shul in downtown Hamilton. It was his focus and determination that ensured financial backing for the construction of the current building on Cline Avenue South in 1962.

Rabbi Green is also credited with the establishment of a Jewish day school, the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, located on the site of the synagogue. He was instrumental in the construction of the mikvah in Hamilton, and it was through his vision that Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak was established.

Sylvia and Rabbi Mordechai Green

Adas Israel is honouring Rabbi Mordechai and Sylvia Green at a tribute dinner on Oct. 20 in recognition of their dedicated leadership. The proceeds will go to the Adas Israel Jewish Education Fund.

"Every child has a right to a Jewish education," Rabbi Green said. "It's a right, not a privilege."

The Hamilton Hebrew Academy ensures that no child in the Hamilton area is denied admission to the school because of lack of funds.

"What I've tried to maintain, in the shul and through education, is the continuity of Jewish tradition. We have to develop a personality that can go out into the world and still maintain his or her personal identity. That requires knowledge, commitment and spirituality… A strong sense of Jewish identity will help guard against the risk of intermarriage and assimilation."

Rabbi Green said the synagogue is a place for every Jew. "I define Orthodoxy in a very inclusive way. An Orthodox Jew is one who commits himself to an ideal."

In the Tribute Journal to be distributed at the dinner, Rabbi Green wrote that when he applied for the position of spiritual leader of Adas Israel, he was asked if he would allow mixed seating at services. (The Conservative Movement was very popular in the 1950s, and except for mixed seating, there were few differences between Orthodox and Conservative services.)

Rabbi Green answered the question with a question: "Now that the mechitzah has been eliminated and mixed seating instituted, are the Jews flocking to Shabbat services each and every week in the Conservative synagogue and Reform temple?"

Told that there was no Shabbat morning service at the temple and attendance at the Conservative synagogue was small, he replied: "It is vital to educate and raise a generation that will understand and feel the true neshamah, the soul of our prayers, in their most pristine sense. In fact, mixed seating is a distraction rather than an attraction."

Rabbi Green graduated from Yeshiva University in 1955 and was recipient of the school's Talmud Award. He then studied at the Bernard Revel Graduate School of Yeshiva University and at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Rabbinic School of Yeshiva University, and was ordained in 1958. During his student years he served as chazzan and rabbi at Stern College in New York.

Sylvia Green attended the Yeshiva of Hartford and was a member of the first class of Stern College for Women of Yeshiva University. Mordechai and Sylvia met at Stern College and married in 1957.

Societies Maintain Proud Tradition

Societies Co-Chairs

Giving and caring have been the hallmarks of Jewish Toronto for more than 100 years. And no network of organizations better symbolizes these attributes than the Landsmanshaften or Societies that established themselves in our city during the early decades of the 20th century.

These mutual benefit Societies - usually made up of members from the same Eastern European communities, who settled in Toronto to escape anti-Semitism - ensured that everyone was looked after from the cradle to the grave.

The Ladies Auxiliaries were especially prolific fundraisers. Nothing was too much for them. They baked, they sold, they knocked on doors. Book sales, bazaars, teas, fashion shows, quilting bees, whatever it took.

According to Michael Rosenberg, who chairs the UJA Federation Societies Division with Morris Flicht, the extraordinary commitment of Societies to tzedakah is vitally alive today, especially for urgent projects in Israel. The generosity of Toronto's Societies has helped to build Israeli daycares, dental clinics, community centres, a therapeutic riding facility for children with special needs and many more facilities.

UJA Federation salutes Toronto's Societies for their compassion, commitment and proud attachment to Jewish values.

Solve Iraq crisis through UN, says Graham

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham spoke out against a preemptive strike on Iraq during a visit to Montreal, saying such an intervention would give a green light to other countries such as China and Russia to start wars with their enemies.

"We are under no illusions about Iraq... but we also recognize that we live in world with many unattractive leaders – Zimbabwe comes to mind. We can't just go out and remove the regimes we don't like," Graham said at a press conference Oct. 4.

The minister was in town to speak to a luncheon organized by the Conseil des Relations Internationale de Montréal (CORIM), a private, nonpartisan group.

The only solution to the Iraq stand-off is a multilateral one, through the United Nations, and within the framework of international law, Graham insisted. He congratulated U.S. President George W. Bush for making his case in an address to the UN, but would not comment on the specifics of the proposed American resolution.

Canada favours the UN Security Council adopting a resolution that clearly calls for Iraq to allow UN inspectors immediate, unlimited and unconditional access to its weaponry and arms-producing facilities, he said.

"Iraq must show complete compliance anytime, anywhere. There can be no more closing of the palaces or excuses that the date is inconvenient. If not, unfortunately, the presumption will be that Iraq has something to hide."

The resolution should spell out what the consequences will be if Iraq does not comply, he added. That may include "intervention," but it does not include toppling Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein because that is not within the UN's capacity, Graham said.

Graham said the resolution should not be worded in such a way as to "make it impossible for Iraq to accept."

"I'm confident the UN Security Council will work out [such a resolution] and the inspectors will have complete access," he said.

If inspection does not discover weapons of mass destruction, then Iraq should be allowed to "rejoin the community of nations," Graham said.

Graham reiterated that the Canadian government is "not in any way naive" about Saddam, given his past, and the evidence British Prime Minister Tony Blair has made known.

"We want to exercise a positive role... Our job is to lay out the big lines of principle," he said.

Asked what Canada's reaction would be in the event of a preemptive U.S. attack on Iraq, Graham said it would depend on whether the United States had reason to believe Iraq was about to strike it or some other target with a chemical weapon or another weapon of mass destruction.

At the CORIM luncheon, Graham said the mounting tensions in the world have their origin in Iraq's refusal over the past 11 years to meet its obligations under the UN Security Council resolutions.

Graham acknowledged that the UN and other international institutions are not perfect, but that is no reason to doubt the necessity of an effective international system founded on rules that have been commonly adopted.

While the main burden is on Iraq at the moment, the international community must also make sure that its institutions come out of this crisis strengthened, he said.

Musician Sam Taylor was 'a rock' in Hamilton's Jewish community

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

Obituary

HAMILTON — When Samuel Taylor died on Sept. 13, age 86, Hamilton lost one of its finest citizens whose commitment to business, music and the Jewish community was unparalleled.

A co-founder of the chartered accountancy firm Taylor Leibow, he was a businessman whose first love was music. He became a professional musician at age 15, playing in jazz bands and the Royal Canadian Air Force Band.

Taylor was also a bassist with the Hamilton Philharmonic Orchestra (HPO) for 35 years and served as president of the Hamilton Musician's Guild for 23 years, beginning in 1970.

When the HPO faced closure in 1996 after losing money on a fund-raising lottery, Taylor immediately stepped in and was credited as a major force in its resurrection.

The city of Hamilton recognized Taylor's many contributions to the community by inducting him into its Gallery of Distinction in 2000.

As an accountant, Taylor served as president of the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Insolvency Association. He also spent 25 years as administrator of the Hamilton Free Loan Society and sat on the board of the Good Shepherds Hostel.

In the Jewish community, he served on the Jewish National Fund's national board of directors and was president of the Hamilton chapter. He also served as president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, president of Temple Anshe Sholom and president of the Hamilton Jewish Federation. In addition, he served on the board of the United Hebrew Chapel and was general chairman, State of Israel Bonds.

In 1977, Taylor was named the Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner honoree. In 1991, B'nai Brith of Hamilton in conjunction with State of Israel Bonds named him Man of the Year.

In a eulogy delivered by his children, Robin and Michael, he was described as "street smart, funny, a lover of people with a deep need to connect... He chose his friends wisely – people of character and depth. We often thought he did so to show us by example whom to emulate."

He was sure to attend all his son's high school basketball games and "he came to every recital, every play, kept every news clipping... Being a husband and father was his life's work and there was never a time when we didn't know that we were monumentally important to him," they said.

"To our family, he was unconditional love. To the community, he was a rock."

Denial of a living reality

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"What is Israel's capital? Sorry, there's no prize for guessing 'Jerusalem.' Not yet, anyway. True, it's been sacred to Jews for 3,000 years or so. And yes, the modern State of Israel has claimed it as its capital for more than a half-century... But the world doesn't want to know. Not United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan. Not U.S. President [George W.] Bush, not Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. Not the Pope. Not any international heavyweight. They live in a state of official denial that borders on the delusional."

So begins Gordon Barthos' highly informative column on a key subject prompted by the passage of a foreign affairs appropriations bill in the U.S. Congress last month ("Deny Jerusalem, deny reality," Toronto Star, Oct. 4). One section of the bill obliges the State Department to treat Jerusalem as Israel's capital and calls for the U.S. embassy to be moved from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. While Bush signed the bill into law, he treated the special Jerusalem section as a non-binding "advisory," due to the current, inhospitable political climate. Still, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat predictably denounced the bill as a "catastrophe."

Barthos effectively contrasts the living reality of Jerusalem as Israel's capital (even claiming that Palestinians "no longer deny" Israel's claim to west Jerusalem as its capital) with the denial of such recognition by the international community. He accurately points out that while Israel proclaimed Jerusalem as its capital in 1950, virtually no countries recognized the move, establishing their embassies in Tel Aviv instead.

In a separate article, Ruth Lapidoth, Hebrew University professor of international law, writes that in the 1948 War of Independence, as Israel fought in self-defence against invading Arab armies and gained control over the western parts of Jersualem, Israel argued that it was entitled to fill the legal limbo created by the end of the British mandate. The same claim was applied to its control of the eastern section taken in another war of self-defence in 1967, although this is rejected internationally.

Lapidoth also explains that while the world has not recognized Israel's de jure sovereignty in Jerusalem, in practice, its control over the western sections has de facto been accepted.

Nonetheless, the international community insists that the legal status of the city can only be decided by negotiations between the parties involved.

During the final status talks at Taba in January 2001, former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak reportedly agreed to former U.S. president Bill Clinton's idea of granting sovereignty to the Palestinians in the Arab areas of the eastern part of the city, and even to allowing shared sovereignty on the Temple Mount. However, both proposals came to naught when Arafat, prodded by Egypt and Saudi Arabia, refused to recognize any Jewish attachment to the Old City, arguing absurdly that the Western Wall is actually in Nablus.

Many analysts believe that, at the end of the day, the two sides will have to arrive at some sort of compromise. But this will depend on the Palestinians finally recognizing the legitimacy of Jewish claims in the city – which is, after all, a symbol of the Jewish people's rightful place in the land.

In this tortured atmosphere, Barthos' concluding lines provide an unusual, calming reassurance: "Modern Israel's claim is unshakable. Jerusalem is its legitimate, lawful capital, and always has been. The day the Mideast is finally at peace, the world will no longer need to live in denial."

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At first, bus driver Baruch Neuman thought the burly passenger he saw in his rearview mirror trying to sneak onto his bus though the back door had fallen down and hurt himself.

It wasn't until Neuman got off the bus with a woman passenger who said she was a paramedic and another man, and began giving first aid to the erstwhile freeloading passenger who had fallen down, that they discovered they were face-to-face with a suicide bomber.

While the bomber did eventually blow himself up under the bridge to Bar-Ilan University, killing one person and wounding 29 more, if he had managed to blow up the bus from inside, many more would have died and been wounded.

Just before 8 a.m. last Thursday, the Dan Bus No. 87 line from Petach Tikvah to Tel Hashomer had pulled up at the busy Bar-Ilan University junction bus station and Neuman opened the doors for passengers.

"I opened the door to let people on and off, and before I closed the back door, I noticed a burly man trying to sneak onto the bus," said Neuman.

"I shut the door on him, and he apparently fell backward onto the road and hurt himself," said the 50-year-old driver, a 24-year veteran of the Dan bus company. Neuman got off the bus to see if he could help the man. He was joined by a woman passenger who said she was a paramedic and by a male passenger.

"The man was lying on the ground and we could see he had a slight head wound and was bleeding, apparently from the fall. We tore open his shirt, to give him air, and just like you see on television, we saw an explosives belt strapped onto his body with wires and everything."

At that point, Neuman and the male passenger looked at each other. "The passenger who was helping me shouted that we should each grab one of the bomber's hands and not let him move so he couldn't detonate himself," Neuman said. "Meanwhile, the bomber, who was conscious, began fighting us and we yelled for everyone to run away and clear the area."

According to Neuman, the passenger helping him to pin down the bomber looked at him and said they should let go together and flee. "We let go of his hands and ran away. When we looked back we saw the bomber get up, start running, and blow himself up."

The bomber ran for about 30 metres toward the people at the bus stop. "I saw the terrorist run after us, and then I heard the explosion," said 45-year-old supermarket cashier Miri Salam.

Vered Zohar, 35, was in one of the cars behind the bus, "listening to music" when she saw a woman get out of a car in front of her and begin running.

Zohar rolled down the window and heard the woman shout "get away, run for your life... so I got out and started to run. At first I thought it was a controlled explosion, like the sappers do when they find a bomb, but then I saw the terrorist's body flying in the air."

As a result of the rush-hour bombing, the police closed the Geha road around Tel Aviv for more than an hour, snarling traffic as they scoured the area for possible accomplices and more bombers.

But by mid-morning, after the slightly damaged bus had been towed away, and a clutch of protesters who tried to block traffic with demands for "revenge" and "death to terrorists" had been dispersed by the police, traffic was back to normal.

There was nothing left at the bus station to show that a little while earlier, a major tragedy was averted because of the quick thinking and bravery of Neuman and his passengers.

Sa'ada Aharon, 71, was killed and 29 others were injured when the bomber blew himself up.

U.S. State Department officials are now working on a "road map" for calming the Israeli-Palestinian violence and restarting negotiations. They have been exchanging drafts of a detailed three-stage plan with European colleagues based on an outline released last month by the Quartet (the United States, EU, UN and Russia). The plan calls for a cooling-off period, followed by the establishment of a Palestinian state with temporary borders, and finally a permanent-status agreement. According to the Quartet's outline, the process will be completed in 2005.

Data reaching Israel indicate that the U.S. draft makes tough demands on both sides. During the first stage, Israel will be required to withdraw to the positions it held before the intifadah broke out two years ago and to freeze settlement construction. The Palestinians will have to rebuild their security services under a unified command and implement comprehensive financial and administrative reforms.

The plan also calls for the temporary Palestinian state to be established on more than 50 per cent of the West Bank. This means an additional Israeli withdrawal would be necessary, as well as the likely evacuation of some isolated settlements. However, this is still only a draft, and it is not clear the White House will approve it as is. The administration has already promised Israel that it will not take a stance on the final borders, leaving this to direct negotiations between the two parties.

For Sharon, the most problematic part of the plan is the strict timetable. Sharon opposes all timetables, arguing that they merely serve to increase pressure on Israel and absolve the Palestinians of responsibility. Instead, he would like every new stage of the process to be contingent on each side meeting specified benchmarks.

Assistant Secretary of State William Burns will visit the region in the next two weeks with the twofold task of obtaining Arab support for an American attack on Iraq and discussing the "road map" with Israel and the Palestinians so that it can be implemented once the Iraqi issue is settled.

During his meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush this week, Sharon will be devoting considerable attention to "the day after Iraq" in an effort to obtain a pledge that the United States will not force an agreement with the Palestinians on Israel. He will also try to determine how much freedom of action the Americans are willing to give him with regard to military operations against the Palestinians, both in the period leading up to an American war on Iraq and during such a war.

DIRECTOR
MARKETING & COMMUNICATIONS

FEDERATION CJA and its fund-raising arm, the Combined Jewish Appeal, seek an experienced senior professional to manage its Marketing and Communications Department.

The ideal candidate will combine creativity and general management skills with a proven hands-on ability to plan and execute major promotional and advertising campaigns; plan and supervise PR, media strategies and media relations with both anglophone and francophone media. American Jewish population declining

The statistics released last week – including the fact that Jews now represent two per cent of the American population – represent only the survey's demographic findings.

Other parts of the study, which will address issues of Jewish identity and affiliation, will be released at the group's annual gathering in Philadelphia at the end of November.

The median age of American Jews climbed from 37 in 1990 to 41 in 2000, with 19 per cent age 65 and older, compared with 15 per cent in 1990.

At the same time, Jewish women approaching the end of their childbearing years, ages 40-44, have an average of 1.8 children, which is below the replacement level of 2.1.

Stephen Hoffman, chief executive officer of the UJC, said the study's conclusions of an aging population coupled with low birth rates "raise policy questions" about how Jewish agencies should spend money.

For example, with fewer Jewish children, agencies might examine policy questions about Jewish camp fees and Jewish school costs.

And with an increasingly aging population, agencies need to focus on caring for the elderly, Hoffman said.

"Unless there are some significant changes" in Jewish demographic patterns, Jews ultimately "are not going to replace themselves," said Frank Mott, a professor of sociology at Ohio State University who co-chaired the National Technical Advisory Committee, which helped steer the 2000-01 NJPS.

America's 5.2 million Jews live in what the NJPS identified as 2.9 million Jewish households.

But the study also found 6.7 million people in those households, which means that 1.5 million people in these households are not Jewish. NJPS officials are not saying yet how those non-Jews are related to the identified Jews.

The NJPS relied on four questions to determine Jewishness. They were: What is your religion, if any; do you consider yourself Jewish for any reason; if your religion is not Judaism, do you have a Jewish mother or father; and if your religion is not Jewish, were you raised Jewish?

Those questions remain virtually unchanged from the last time the NJPS was conducted in 1990, when it threw American Jewry into upheaval by showing that 52 per cent of Jews who married in the previous five years had chosen non-Jewish spouses.

One critic of the NJPS who issued his own report last month identifying 6.7 million Jews blasted the initial results as a "methodological disaster."

Gary Tobin, president of the San Francisco-based Institute for Jewish & Community Research, said the NJPS scared away some Jews by asking screening questions about their religion immediately.

Unlike his own study, which located 250 Jewish households by asking a series of general questions first, the NJPS "waded way too quickly" into the Jewish survey, he said.

Ira Sheskin, a member of the NJPS advisory panel and a geography professor at the University of Miami, said he could not explain why Tobin came up with different figures from NJPS.

But Sheskin, who has criticized Tobin's study for casting too wide a net in determining Jews, said the dueling studies differ only in "how you go about defining who is a Jew."

Calvin Goldscheider, a professor of Judaic studies at Brown University, said a key challenge now will be to study the 1.5 million non-Jews living in the 2.9 million Jewish households that the study identified.

Buenos Aires attack indictments planned

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine judicial officials say they are planning to issue indictments against members of Hezbollah for carrying out a deadly car bombing of the Jewish community centre here in 1994.

Armed with information provided by the Argentine intelligence service Secretaria de Inteligencia del Estado, the officials have announced that they have crucial evidence linking Hezbollah leaders to the attack.

Marta Nercellas, lawyer for the Jewish umbrella organization DAIA, said the evidence provided by the intelligence service agrees with the judiciary reconstruction of the attack and other information provided by international intelligence services.

Prosecutors have also announced that they now have crucial details about the attack, including the identity of the suicide bomber who drove a van carrying some 600 pounds of explosives and destroyed the AMIA community centre on July 18, 1994.

The bombing killed 85 people and wounded hundreds.

Last month, the local media reported that the driver was a Lebanese member of Hezbollah. The CIA, working with the intelligence service in the case, reportedly confirmed the driver's identity.

After the AMIA attack, a park in Lebanon was named in honour of the driver, according to judicial officials here.

Argentine officials also maintain that Iranian diplomats travelling in and out of Argentina before the attack served as a support team for the terrorist squad that carried out the bombing.

According to legal observers, Argentine officials may seek international arrest warrants for members of the hit squad, former Iranian intelligence minister Ali Fallahian and Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah.

As a result of diplomatic concerns and a possible lack of evidence, however, warrants are unlikely to be issued against top Iranian leaders who allegedly ordered the attack, the observers said.

The documents issued by the Argentine judiciary will also indicate that the terrorist squad included Lebanese who had trained in the Middle East and entered Argentina illegally through the lawless borders between Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay.

More than eight years after the AMIA attack, none of those who masterminded the deadly bombing have been brought to trial.

Last year, a trial began against 20 people accused of playing a supporting role in the attack.

Jewish leaders here and abroad have blamed Argentina's inability to find the culprits on incompetence, corruption and anti-Semitism among security and government officials.

The investigative judge handling the case, Juan Jose Galeano, had asked in 1994 for indictments to be handed down against a group of Iranian suspects. The Argentine Supreme Court denied his demand at that time, saying he lacked sufficient evidence.

Since then, Galeano has been trying to gather enough evidence to secure international arrest warrants.

Galeano, who just returned from a three-week trip to the United States, has now gotten what he needs, said Alberto Nisman, the prosecutor in the trial of the 20 accomplices.

"The elements are already in place to ask for some Hezbollah members' arrest," Nisman said.

Word about the new round of indictments was met with skepticism by some Jewish officials here.

The Latin American representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Sergio Widder, said the latest announcements from the judiciary are "an immoral use of the AMIA attack more than serious investigations."

Widder noted that the announcements came just months after former Argentine president Carlos Menem was accused of getting a $10-million bribe to cover up Iran's responsibility for the 1994 bombing – an allegation Menem denied.

The announcements, Widder added, may have more to do with politics than with any real breakthrough in the case.

October 7

• Security officials announced they arrested three Israeli Arabs in Ramla, central Israel, who are suspected of planning to carry out terrorist attacks for Hamas.

October 8

October 9

• Israel transferred nearly $15 million (US) in tax money to the Palestinian Authority. The money was the third and final payment of Israel's promised transfer of some $42 million (US) in tax revenue that Israel had refused to turn over.

October 10

• Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan personally directed the transfer of funds to families of suicide bombers, according to documents seized during and since Operation Defensive Shield. The documents include handwritten cheques signed by Ramadan and some documents signed by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat that show he was complicit in helping the Palestinian Liberation Front, headed by its Baghdad-based founder, Mohammed Zaidan (Abu Abbas) and his local representative, Rakad Salam, secretary of the Arab Liberation Front and the Iraqi Ba'ath party in the territories.

October 11

• A reconciliatory meeting between the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the Islamic militant Hamas organization was "very positive," PA official Ziad Abu Amr said. A committee to reconcile Hamas and PA factions was established after riots broke out in Gaza on Monday and Tuesday between Hamas supporters and the Palestinian police, in which five people, most of them Hamas members, were killed.

After 500 years, Jews leaving North African Spanish enclaves

By HILLEL LANDES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MADRID — Growing anti-Semitism and poor economic prospects are threatening to extinguish two Jewish communities on the North African coast.

After the expulsion from Spain in 1492, a small number of Jews escaped across the Strait of Gibraltar to two fortress cities that Spanish kings were establishing as beachheads in North Africa.

Despite the Inquisition on the Iberian mainland, the Jewish inhabitants of Ceuta and Melilla were largely left alone for the next five centuries. They were joined by other Sephardi Jews over the centuries.

But their descendants are now leaving the enclaves, which are surrounded by Moroccan territory, and returning to Spain.

"In 10 years, perhaps there will be no one here," said Mesod Bengio, a Jewish perfume merchant in Ceuta.

Ceuta and slightly smaller Melilla are unlike any other part of Spain, where no Jews lived – at least not openly – until religious freedom was reinstated in the 19th century.

Jews in Ceuta and Melilla, which measure about eight and five square miles, respectively, have lived cheek by jowl, but largely in peace, with Christians, Muslims and a small minority of Hindus.

Historical evidence shows Jews living in Ceuta as far back as the 12th century. The Jewish presence in Melilla is said to have started several years after the expulsion with a Spanish aristocrat who had Jewish ancestors.

Ceuta's total population is around 70,000; Melilla is slightly smaller. Though their Jewish communities today are small – some 300 in Ceuta and around 800 in Melilla – they still have functioning Sephardi synagogues, schools and butcher shops. That's down from their peak in the late 1960s, when there were about 600 Jews in Ceuta and 1,000 in Melilla.

However, the communities' future has grown uncertain since the Sept. 11 attacks and Moroccan King Mohamed's renewed claims of sovereignty over the cities fired up young Muslim inhabitants.

In the past year, eggs, rocks and bottles have been thrown at Ceuta's Sephardi synagogue while Jews were at prayer, Palestinian flags and graffiti glorifying Osama bin Laden have been painted on synagogues and churches, and graves in Melilla's Jewish cemetery have been desecrated.

Meanwhile, Moroccan claims over the enclaves have become more vociferous since last summer's crisis with Spain over Perejil Island, an uninhabited island 1½ miles from Ceuta. Moroccan troops occupied the island, but were swiftly kicked off by Spanish soldiers.

Morocco argues that if Spain wants Gibraltar back from Britain – which has held it since the early 18th century – then, by the same logic, it should be prepared to give Ceuta and Melilla to Morocco.

"Now they're Spanish," said another Ceuti Jew, Jose Benchimol. "Who knows what could happen in 10 years?"

Some commentators sketch worst-case scenarios.

"If anyone doesn't think that within a year or two we"ll be at war over Ceuta and Melilla – be it terrorism or open war" – then he "doesn't want to see the obvious," one columnist wrote in Spain's El Mundo newspaper.

What might Moroccan rule be like for Jews in the enclaves?

"Morocco has always accepted Jews," said Benchimol, who spent 12 years as vice-president of Ceuta's Jewish community. He noted that there are still Jews in Rabat, Morocco's capital, who "live peacefully and have endured the intifadah without repercussions."

However, many Jews who today live in Ceuta and Melilla fled there from Morocco after the 1967 Six-Day War, when Morocco was swept up in the Arab world's outrage over Israel's victory.

Benchimol echoed Spanish leaders' frequent assertions that Ceuta and Melilla are paragons of interfaith harmony. The leaders of the different faith communities "always wish each other happy holidays," he noted.

Still, he conceded that inter-ethnic harmony doesn't always filter down to the population at large – particularly to Muslim youths who have become radicalized since Sept. 11.

> 'Who knows what could happen in 10 years?'

Madrid's chief rabbi, Moshe Ben Dahan, is a former Ceuta resident. He moved there from Morocco with his family after the 1967 Six Day War, when he was 12 years old, and later moved to Madrid after yeshiva studies in Israel.

Ben Dahan downplayed the impact of anti-Semitism in Ceuta and Melilla. Yet he acknowledged that the communities are dwindling – primarily, he said, because there is little future for young Jews in the enclaves, whose economies are dependent on tourism, trade and government subsidies.

"The Jews are going to big cities like Madrid, Malaga and Barcelona where there are more possibilities for educated people to work," the rabbi said. "The young people are leaving and the old are dying."

JF&CS takes part in Child Abuse Prevention Month

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto commuters may see volunteers from Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) or other children's aid societies handing out purple ribbons at selected subway stations this month.

The Purple Ribbon Campaign was designed to raise awareness for Child Abuse Prevention Month, which is marking its 10th anniversary in Ontario. On Oct. 1, JF&CS joined the Children's Aid Society of Toronto and the Catholic Children's Aid Society of Toronto at the kick-off event for Child Abuse Prevention Month at Toronto City Hall.

"We want people to be aware that child abuse is very much an issue within all of society," said Howard Hurwitz, JF&CS' director of children's services, in a recent phone interview. "I think there's a tendency to think that as a Jewish community we're immune and somewhat protected from the issue of child abuse, and that's not true."

In fact, JF&CS has about 120 cases of child abuse investigations open at any one time, said Hurwitz. Over the year that ended March 31, 2002, JF&CS completed 474 child protection investigations, of which 81 (17 per cent) were confirmed to have a valid basis for concern about a child being physically, sexually or emotionally harmed.

Although the number of investigations has remained steady for the last several years, said Hurwitz, JF&CS has seen a growing incidence of children experiencing emotional harm.

"We see a lot of families in distress, experiencing stress due to unemployment or being low income. A lot of families are on the verge of separation and divorce, and children are being caught in the crossfire." In some cases, he said, the level of animosity is so high that parents – without realizing it – cause damage to their children.

In those cases JF&CS may become involved in providing counselling or other support services.

The agency has parenting groups, funding for recreational activities for children of low-income families, volunteers who provide respite care for parents, and staff assistance with "child management difficulties" including getting children to bed and dealing with fussy eaters.

"[Parents] resort to desperate things when they're frustrated and don't know what to do," said Hurwitz, commenting on situations that precipitate abuse.

He also noted that, although Canada's criminal code allows parents and teachers to use "reasonable force" without fear of prosecution, JF&CS has taken the position that any kind of hitting is not acceptable. Hitting often escalates, leaves emotional scars, and is not an effective way of correcting behaviour, Hurwitz said. "It teaches a child to be fearful, rather than helping them problem-solve."

People who suspect that a child has been abused can call JF&CS to request an investigation. "They don't have to identify themselves," said Hurwitz. Professionals such as doctors and teachers have a legal obligation to report suspected abuse.

DVI concert dedicated to late founder

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In tribute to the late Trudi Birger, a Holocaust survivor who founded and directed a dental clinic for underprivileged children in Jerusalem called Dental Volunteers for Israel, this year's DVI Canada's 18th Annual Musical Soirée will be dedicated in her honour.

Birger, who died July 19, pledged during the Holocaust that if she survived, she would do something to better the lot of needy children.

More than 20 years ago, Birger, a microbiologist by training, founded DVI, which offers free dental and preventive care for Jerusalem's underprivileged children. The clinic serves the dental needs of youngsters under 18, regardless of race, colour or religion. Many are new olim who would otherwise not be able to afford dental care.

In honour of her memory, the clinic itself has been renamed "The Trudi Birger Dental Clinic."

Birger, who emigrated to Israel with her husband and mother after the war, was very active at the clinic with patients, their families and staff, as well as the hundreds of volunteer dentists from all over the world who contribute their professional expertise.

The concert which, will be held at the Royal Conservatory of Music, Ettore Mazzoleni Concert Hall, at 273 Bloor St. West on Sunday, Oct. 20 at 7:30 p.m., will feature pianist Shaya Petroff and renowned violinist Moshe Hammer.

Petroff is a well-known pianist who has performed in recital with many outstanding artists, including Ofra Harnoy, Martin Beaver, Catherine Manoukian and Senia Trubashnik.

Hammer, whose unique interpretations and vibrant tones, is a sought-after violinist for solo, concerto and chamber appearances and has performed throughout North America, Europe and Israel.

He has been the music director of the Amadeus Ensemble since 1985.

For more information on the concert or DVI Canada, call the chairman, Stanley Jacobson, 416-781-8607 or e-mail stanleymjacobson@rogers.com.

Film depicts the struggle between good and evil

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

German director Werner Herzog ventures into unchartered terrain in Invincible, now playing at the Carlton Cinemas.

Herzog's previous films, Aguirre: The Wrath of God and Fitzcarraldo, were set in the steamy jungles of South America, and pitted mere men against the implacable wrath of nature.

But in Invincible, based on the all too brief life of a Jewish strongman from eastern Poland, the locale shifts to Weimar Germany on the eve of Adolf Hitler's accession to power.

The movie unfolds over a seven-month period, and essentially deals with the sharply divergent way in which two totally different individuals define themselves.

Zishe Beitbart (Jouko Ahola), a traditional Jew living in a remote village far from the hustle and bustle of a city, is a blacksmith whose tightly ordered world is circumscribed and whose destiny seems preordained.

The only anomaly in his otherwise bland persona is his rare, incredible physical strength. In an early scene that establishes the film's story line, Zishe blithely manhandles several bigots who have poked malicious fun at Jews.

Zishe, clearly, is a force to be reckoned with, someone with whom one trifles only at one's peril.

When he handily defeats an unbeaten brute at a circus contest, word travels swiftly about his prowess. A talent agent from a vaudeville house arrives in the shtetl and offers Zishe a chance for employment, maybe even fame, in glittering Berlin.

"For a Jew, this is not the right thing," Zishe's father says. But as he ponders the matter, his father decides that the offer must be a divine sign that Zishe should be more than a humble blacksmith.

"You will go out into the world," he advises his son "But do not forget who you are."

Zishe's employer, Erik Jan Hanussen (Tim Roth), supposedly a Danish aristocrat, is a slick, sleazy hypnotist, clairvoyant and mind reader whose entertainment palace caters largely to Nazi storm troopers and and their sympathizers.

"The Jewish name must go at once," Hanussen declares after meeting Zishe. "We will Aryanize you."

Bedecked as a Roman gladiator in a blonde wig, Zishe is renamed Siegfried, a hero of German mythology. The rowdy brownshirts are impressed by his feats of strength, but Zishe is none too comfortable in this overtly racist milieu.

An anti-Semitic routine about a stereotypical Jewish banker making off with war profits leaves him offended, as does Hanussen's public proclamation that Hitler will soon lead Germany to great heights.

As portrayed by Ahola, a Finnish athlete with bulging muscles and an impish appearance, Zishe is a person whose apparent guilelessness conceals a fairly shrewd mind.

And although Zishe is basically unworldly, his eyes fall lovingly upon Marta (Anna Gourari), Hanussen's demure pianist and sex slave. Her dream is to play Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto accompanied by a full orchestra and to flee her cruel master's grasp.

Invincible, whose implicit sub-theme is the struggle between good and evil, takes on added poignancy when Zishe, fed up with his disguise as an Aryan and brimming with Jewish pride, startles the audience by disclosing his Jewish background and describing himself as a "new Samson."

The Nazis are disgusted as Siegfried suddenly morphs into Samson. But to the Jewish customers in Hanussen's establishment, Zishe is a godsend.

One can empathize with Herzog's depiction of Nazis as ruffians, but his attempt to paint them also as buffoons is simply overdrawn.

The inevitable clash between Zishe and Hanussen, whose goal is to be Hitler's minister of the occult, surfaces when Zishe, on stage, accuses him of being a fraud.

That accusation leads to a trial – during which Marta scandalizes onlookers by revealing that Hanussen is actually a Czech Jew by the name of Herschel Steinschneider – and to unforseen consequences.

As a drama and a parable, Invincible usually works reasonably well. But at times, it inhabits the space of a cold, airless universe devoid of humanity. And while Roth is scintillatingly sinister and Gourari is innocently fetching, Ahola is mostly a blank slate, a mild presence rather than a supernatural force.

The film hints at the dire dangers awaiting European Jews. But in 1933, the Holocaust seems like a faraway catastrophe as Invincible heads toward its climax.

THE ISRAELI SUPREME COURT

Ten years after it opened, Israel's magnificent Supreme Court building still embodies the ideals of a just and humanitarian democratic society, and still remains what my guide, Amir Orly, calls "the pearl of Israeli architecture."

The structure sits in an exclusive and stately setting in central Jerusalem, on the Israeli equivalent to America's Capitol Hill. In a straight line to the south, there's a clear view of the box-like Knesset: the brother-and-sister team of architects, Ram Karmi and Ada Karmi-Melamede, were intent on highlighting the direct connection between the place where legislation is enacted and the place where it is carried out.

Other buildings in the vicinity include the Prime Minister's Office, a new Foreign Affairs building and offices for the environment, health, treasury, social affairs and other ministries. Also close by is the Bank of Israel, which Amir compares to America's Federal Reserve.

"It's built like the Israeli economy," he jokes. "It's an inverted pyramid with too many managers and not enough workers." Yet another impressive neighbour is the Israel Museum, which he considers a smallish counterpart to Washington's Smithsonian Institute.

Despite its bureaucratic function, the Supreme Court building seems refreshingly light, spare and pleasing. We approach along a promenade through an exotic garden featuring olive, cyprus and pomegranate trees as well as lavender, rosemary, hadas and other herbs that are representative of King Solomon's Song of Songs.

The sidewalk narrows – as do, supposedly, the paths of justice. Amir points out the building's contrast of shapes, straight and round: justice is circular, to be forever pursued and never fully attained, he explains, whereas the law is supposedly straight and strict. The architecture alludes to a line from the Psalms, "He leads me in the circles of justice."

Other contrasts abound. There are two kinds of stone, the pure, smooth, white stone associated with Tel Aviv and the rough-hewn, old, creamy limestone associated with Jerusalem and known as Jerusalem stone. There is also a lively dialogue between old and new that you sense everywhere in Israel.

"This is a young country, but the Jewish people is a very old people with roots deep in the ground," is how Amir puts it.

The promenade continues indoors, lined by streetlights as though we were still outdoors; the brilliant interplay of outer and inner elements is a symbolic attempt to integrate the court with the society that built it. Likewise, the five courtrooms are usually flooded with daylight "so you feel you are partly outside even when you are inside." No dark, obscure, oppressively heavy Kafkaesque halls of justice here.

There are cloistered courtyards, elegant domes and familiar references to ancients tombs, temples, gates, archways, towers and walls. Yet despite its complexity, the architecture seems transparently pure and spiritually uplifting. It's poetry in stone.

The building has three levels: the criminals come from below, the judges from above, the public via the promenade on the middle level.

"The idea is that everyone meets in the centre," Amir says. The middle level also features a glorious panoramic view of Jerusalem, in part so the judges never lose sight of the city and its populace.

Nothing quite like the Israeli Supreme Court building could exist in Baghdad, Beijing, Havana, Moscow or any other capital of a repressive regime. For that matter, the building, with its playful homage to a range of regional architectural styles from the Herodian era to the period of the British Mandate, could not have been built in any place except Jerusalem.

Arguably as unique and contextually appropriate as the Temple of olden times, the Israeli Supreme Court is a triumphant architectural embrace of the ideals of democratic humanism by an ancient-modern people whose reverence for justice and jurisprudence is but one of many gifts it has given to mankind.

Filmmaker studies the human side of the intifadah

By JEFF BERCUSON
Special to The CJN

In 2000, when award-winning documentary filmmaker Elad Winkler sat down to watch a home movie he had made eight years earlier, he was shocked by what he saw.

The video, self-recorded in a Much Music Speaker's Corner style, shows Winkler, then 12, acting as both an Israeli and a Palestinian. In it, he presents both views of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, conveying the opinions and hardships endured by each side without any bias or partiality.

"I couldn't believe how little had changed since the first intifadah in 1992 [when I made the video]," says Winkler. "Israelis and Palestinians are still fighting and there are no signs of peace in sight. Even more, George Bush is still the president."

It was this lack of progress and his disappointment in the failed peace negotiations that inspired Winkler to tackle the same subject in a new way for his final project as a student in the Ryerson University's film program.

At its core, Conflict is the story of one man – Winkler himself – returning to his homeland.

Conflict was presented at many film festivals and won best documentary award at the Montreal World Film Festival; best documentary and runner-up for best film at the Aspirations Film Festival in Waterloo, Ont.; winner of the best film award at the National Student Short Film Festival in Toronto and was a semi-finalist for best documentary at the Angelus Awards in Hollywood.

Though he moved to Canada from Rehovot, a small town 20 minutes east of Tel Aviv, when he was nine, Winkler still feels a strong connection to his place of birth.

"Israel will always be my home," he says. "I was born there, I grew up there and most of my extended family is there. That connection will never go away."

Conflict follows Winkler, who also narrates the film, as he returns to Israel to interview those who have been affected by the violence of the second intifadah.

"The film looks at both the beauty and the ugliness of Israel," says Winkler. "It reveals the human suffering behind the conflict and looks at those who have to live with it every day of their lives."

When Winkler made the initial decision to narrate the film himself, he was concerned that people might accuse him of bias.

His desire for impartiality is clearly shown by the inclusion of testimony from a Palestinian member of Knesset, an Arab-Israeli musician, a Muslim religious leader and a Palestinian teacher, in addition to interviews with Jewish survivors of violence, government officials, artists and civilians.

"I tried extremely hard to incorporate the views of both sides, rather than just show one perspective," Winkler says. "I wanted viewers to walk away from Conflict with all the information and then be able to formulate their own thoughts and opinions.

"People are going to see what they want to see," he says. "If you approach the movie with an open mind, you'll see that it is less about sides and more about frustration over a lack of progress."

He believes his skills for diplomacy and understanding every perspective come from the time he spent as a child with Scouts Tzabar, an Israeli youth group.

"Tzabar was a good arena for debate," he says, mentioning trips he took to New York to meet with other Israeli youth.

During those trips, Winkler formulated the political opinions that would remain with him throughout high school and university. As a self-described member of the left wing, he is often critical of the actions of the Israeli government.

"I don't think Israel does everything right. I acknowledge that sometimes [their actions] may be necessary, but rarely are they helpful to the peace process," he says. "Too often, [Israeli politicians] think only in the short term, with only the goal of retaliation in mind."

Despite these sentiments, Winkler had planned to join the Israeli army if he didn't get accepted to Ryerson. In fact, he cites his decision to remain in school as another of his reasons for making Conflict.

"I felt a little guilty about not joining the army, because as a citizen, it is something you must do," he admits. "Instead I just decided to make a film that would educate people about the conflict."

Winkler plans to take the film on tour and show it at film festivals in Toronto, Montreal and Los Angeles, including at the Montreal International Film Festival. In addition to the festival circuit, Conflict will be screened in schools as an educational tool.

"Most people don't know too much about the conflict," he says. "They see it as being repetitive with always the same provocation, just with different people. This film is trying to promote higher levels of awareness and tolerance."

Winkler, who funded Conflict himself, is in the early stages of starting a production company. He is also busy planning his next film, which he says will definitely include Israel in some manner.

"Right now, I'm thinking about doing a film on the army," he says. "Seeing the effects of service, as well as what people do once they leave, would make a great film."

CBC DOCUMENTARY ON SPEED DATING

Ilan Saragosti, a Jewish Montrealer of Sephardi origin, has lived for the last three years in Vancouver, where he made A Match Made in Seven, an offbeat documentary about Jewish speed-dating in Vancouver.

The documentary illustrates the crazy tactics needed and the lengths people are willing to go to meet that special someone.

It follows four single 30-something Jews determined to find their "perfect match" and tracks their results after the big night. It recently won an award for Best Documentary at the Temecula International Film Festival in California.

CBC Newsworld's Rough Cuts, Oct. 22, 10 p.m. Repeat broadcast, Oct. 26, 10 p.m.

* * *

Komedy Kabaret: The Morris "Nafty" Naftolin Komedy Kabaret is meant for people who like to smile, laugh and tell or hear good jokes. Amateur comedians and raconteurs are invited to claim their five minutes of fame on the cabaret's stage, and everyone is invited to enjoy an afternoon of laughter and entertainment.

Bernard Betel Centre, Auditorium. Free admission; refreshments. 1003 Steeles Ave. W. (west of Bathurst). Oct. 24, 2:30 p.m. 416-225-2112, Ruth Cohen.

New Sherman Offering: "Risk is necessary" is a credo of the local Necessary Angel Theatre Company, whose current season features a sneak preview of a work in development by Toronto playwright Jason Sherman, who has never shied away from taking risks.

Sherman's new piece, The Message, attempts to weave "a compelling portrait of the last days of Marshall McLuhan." Other plays in the season (which begins Oct. 24) are Swollen Tongues, Last Romantics and Tamara. The Message runs at Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman Ave., Nov. 22 to 24. 416-531-1827 or 416-703-4006.

Jewish Stamps: Newly produced by Schreiber Publishing of Rockville, Md., The Jewish World in Stamps: 4000 Years of Jewish Civilization on Postage Stamps is a large hardcover book that shows more than 2,000 stamps in full colour from some 70 countries, delineating Jewish history from Biblical times to the present.

Just about every major personality and event in the Hebrew Scripture has evidently been featured on a stamp. The variety of stamps featuring Jewish themes and personalities is surprising: Micronesia, for instance, issued a stamp on Abraham Joshua Heschel, Togo on Elie Wiesel and Grenada on Leonard Bernstein.

Dozens of countries have issued Einstein commemorative stamps, and synagogues have appeared on multitudes of stamps from China to the Dutch Antilles.

Are You Serious About Permanent Weight Loss?

After Losing 47 Pounds Amy Says...

"My Husband Can't Keep His Hands Off Me!"

My name is Amy Ransom. I live with my husband and daughter. When my husband returned from six months at sea I was 47 pounds lighter. Now he can't keep his hands off me! This is my story. It's true and factual.

I lost 47 pounds with hypnosis. 6 pounds the first week. 15 pounds the first month. My dress size plunged from an embarrassing 16 to an elegant size 10. I'm actually 7 pounds less than my original goal. It was that easy. I feel great.

Amy Ransom before Positive Changes Hypnosis

Overweight hurts. I should know; I was heavy at 6 years old. I tried everything. Shakes, prepackaged foods, support groups and stupid diets. With every diet I only lost more self-control.

Food was my life. I lived on fast food. I made excuses for buying junk food. I once baked chocolate chip cookies to send to my husband. Only half the batch made it. The rest went to my bulging hips and thighs.

I used to avoid outings to the beach. I resented the other wives in their skimpy bikinis. I wouldn't even take off my shorts. I hid from cameras.

Picture this. We're at the playground. My daughter crawls into a tube. I can't fit. My husband has to go after her. That was when I knew I was out of control... way out of control!

I heard about Positive Changes Hypnosis on the radio. My husband was skeptical. I was desperate. I decided to give it a try. I went to the free screening with hope and an open mind. There was no high-pressure sales talk. My consultant explained hypnosis. How the program worked. What kind of results I could expect. I signed up.

I noticed changes after my very first session. My confidence skyrocketed. I did it without stress. No cravings, NO DIETS, NO DRUGS. I didn't starve myself, count calories, attend group meetings or weigh food. I learned self-hypnosis. I enjoy 100% control over my eating behaviour.

I feel proud and attractive. I get lots of compliments. I have a waist now!

I even had some boudoir pictures taken. I couldn't believe it was me posing for the camera. My husband loved the photos! It's great to feel desirable.

My body is in better shape now than when I was 18. I'm full of energy. I love being active with my daughter. We can run, play and roll around on the floor. I'm a better role model for her.

Hypnosis has improved every aspect of my life. I feel good just walking down the street.

Positive Changes Hypnosis delivered on their promises. My weight loss was fast, easy and effortless. No hassle. No fuss. I'm walking, talking, living proof hypnosis delivers results.

The day I greeted my husband at the ship was the proudest of my life. He kept looking me over from head to toe and muttering, "Wow!" I know he's proud of me. I can see it in his shining eyes. I couldn't be more satisfied. I'm convinced most anyone can get the results I did. That's why I'm sharing my story with you.

I urge you to call Positive Changes Hypnosis and schedule a free evaluation. It's fun, informative and only takes 20 minutes. Don't suffer one more minute. I know Positive Changes Hypnosis can help you. Their fees are reasonable and their guarantee is the best in the business.

Call now while you're thinking about it. Tell them Amy sent you.

WHY HYPNOSIS WORKS:

√ Eat only when you're hungry. Stop when you're full!
√ Hypnosis programs "correct" eating strategies into your subconscious.
√ Clients report new behaviours that feel "natural" upon awakening.
√ Skilled hypnotists can help you eliminate habitual triggers that cause you to overeat!

OUR NO RISK GUARANTEE

Your success is our top priority. If at your first program session you are not satisfied for any reason, we will refund 100% of your money before you leave the building. No questions asked. You risk nothing.

Koufax's legacy lives on

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The ball rolled off his fingers with such velocity and spin that when it met the wind, the air cried.

Marilyn Pink, a biomechanical researcher in Los Angeles, performed an analysis of Sandford (Sandy) Koufax's curve ball and found that it was biomechanically perfect.

Koufax, the greatest Jewish major league baseball player since Hank Greenberg, was like a meteor streaking across the heavens.

In 12 seasons with the Dodgers, first in Brooklyn and then in Los Angeles, Koufax compiled an astonishing record.

From 1962 to 1966, the year he retired due to an arthritic arm, he led the National League in earned run average and in strikeouts. He was the first pitcher to throw four no-hitters, including a perfect game in 1965, and he won the Cy Young Award as best pitcher three times. In 1972, he became the youngest person ever to be inducted into the Hall of Fame. Sports Illustrated, in 1999, named him athlete of the century.

And lest we forget, the Brooklyn-born Koufax achieved iconic status, among Jewish fans at least, when, on Oct. 6, 1965, he refused to pitch a World Series game because it fell on Yom Kippur.

Jane Leavy, a former sports writer for the Washington Post, has written a literate and appealing biography of Koufax, a publicity-shy man who abhorred self-promotion and declined to live off his past.

The book, Sandy Koufax: A Lefty's Legacy (HarperCollins), is an unauthorized biography.

Leavy admits she had problems writing it, given the nature of Koufax's personality and his refusal to be interviewed.

How, she wonders in the preface, "do you write about someone who would prefer not to be written about, a public person who has chosen to lead a private life but whose public deeds demand consideration?"

In a word, with difficulty.

Despite these impediments and the fact Leavy never actually saw Koufax in action, she has produced an intriguing and nuanced account of his life.

Basketball, believe it or not, was really Koufax's passion. His dream was to play for the New York Knicks.

Koufax's record in his first three years in the majors was dismal: nine wins and 10 losses.

By the end of the 1960 season, Koufax had won 36 games and had lost 40 – "a study in mediocrity," Leavy observes – and he was ready to quit.

Fortune smiled on Koufax in 1961, when he broke Christy Mathewson's 58-year-old single-season strikeout record and pitched his first no-hitter, a 5-0 triumph over the New York Mets.

From 1962 onward, he was virtually unbeatable, leading the majors in every category: most wins (111), lowest earned-run-average (1.95), winning percentage (.766), strikeouts (1,444), shutouts (33) and no-hitters (four).

As well, he won the World Series Most Valuable Player Award twice and was named Player of the Decade.

But until his decision to refrain from pitching on Yom Kippur, he was merely a terrific ballplayer, a teammate recalls. After Yom Kippur, he became a symbol.

As Leavy puts it: "By refusing to pitch, he... reinforced Jewish pride... a feat as prodigious as any he accomplished on the field."

Now close to 70, Koufax remains a legend in his own time, a classy guy who burnished America's national pasttime.

Bridge is a member of a large family of card games that involve trick-taking. In various countries (notably Russia, England, and Italy), a number of trick-taking card games have been played for centuries. In 1925, Harold S. Vanderbilt defined the rules and scoring of contract bridge. He must have done something right as the rules and scoring of the game have remained largely unchanged for over 75 years. Contract bridge has been the most popular card game in the world for most of its history.

Bridge with Gitelman

Vanderbilt was not only the man who pioneered contract bridge, he was also one of the game's finest players. This deal (which took place in 1929) features Vanderbilt in action as declarer.

NORTH	EAST
♠ AK8	♠ J93
♥	♥ J82
♦ AK86	♦ J97
♣ AKJ1082	♣ Q954
WEST	SOUTH
♠ Q6	♠ 107542
♥ K106	♥ AQ97543
♣ 76	♣ 3

The bidding saw Vanderbilt end up as the declarer in 6♠. West's opening lead was the ♦4. Cover the East-West hands and think about how you would play this hand as the declarer before reading on.

6♠ is not an especially good contract, but Vanderbilt found the only line of play that would ensure his slam provided that trumps broke 3-2 and clubs broke no worse than 4-2. He made the unusual (but critical) play at trick one of winning the opening lead in the dummy while discarding his singleton club!

Vanderbilt continued by ruffing a club in his hand, crossing to the dummy in trumps, and ruffing another club to establish that suit. Then he played a second round of trump to the dummy. When both defenders followed, the slam became a sure thing.

Vanderbilt started playing winning clubs from the dummy and East was welcome to ruff in with the ♠J whenever he wanted. That would be the only trick for the defense. The dummy would be high except for 2 diamond losers. Declarer could ruff one of those losers with his last trump and use his ♥A to take care of the dummy's last small diamond.

Nowadays the average player bids at least as effectively as the top experts did in the 1920s, but even in the 21st century, Vanderbilt's play of this deal still qualifies as exceptional.

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Las Vegas-based company, Bridge Base Inc., is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. You can find out more about Fred and his company through www.bridgebase.com. Fred's columns will appear once a month in the Canadian Jewish News. On being a matchmaker

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The first Torah portion, Bereshit, states that "a man leaves his father and his mother and clings to his wife, and they become one flesh." I was amazed to learn that a statement of closeness between a husband and wife appears in the same portion as the creation of the world.

It would seem that "becoming one flesh" is integral and dramatically important to the creation story. Clearly, Judaism puts a lot of stock in the importance of the relationship of love and marriage.

Unfortunately, the strong emphasis on finding one's soulmate can also be very distressing, because the significance Judaism places on marriage and partnering often puts enormous stress on those who are single.

This often manifests itself in an excruciating ache of loneliness. Some say the emptiness of being single is harder on women than men because of the pressure of the "biological clock." This might be true; however, loneliness is a throbbing black hole in the gut, for both genders.

With all the stress placed on "becoming one flesh" in Judaism and the Jewish community, an exciting and worthwhile industry has cropped up – matchmaking.

Yenta, in Fiddler on the Roof was a parody of the meddling matchmaker we all know and try to keep our distance from. Crossing Delancy, a Hollywood film starring Amy Irving, emphasized the Jewish grandmother's need to marry off her granddaughter and the anxiety people go through when seeking their bashert (soulmate).

One of the things we might want to commit to in the New Year, therefore, is to try to bring together two soulmates, by becoming a "nouveau-matchmaker," a sensitive shadchan.

It is important that we consider this colourful grassroots hobby, because the attempt to find a marriage-partner is a difficult one. The difficulty might stem from the quiet, demure Canadian mentality, and/or from the demographical challenge of finding the right spouse from the limited number of community members who are the right fit.

So, how do you become a matchmaker? There are shadchanim in our community who could give workshops on the art of matchmaking. If you know a matchmaker, ask him or her for a few tips. By the way, he or she might mention "shadchanim gelt" – the matchmaker's fee. Being a shadchan can be lucrative!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Here are some tips of my own. Carry a pen and pad with you at all times. When you meet a single person who is interested in dating, write down the name and phone number. Create your own special file, making notes about the person. For example, "She is a poet," or "He loves travelling." Over time, potential matches will pop out at you.

Base your choices on character traits and interests. People are compatible, generally, because of shared desires and worldviews, not because they are single.

Be diligent. Invite singles for Shabbat or for dinner. Take a risk and don't shy away from putting the love deal together. Many people say, "No, I don't want to get involved and be responsible for a bad relationship." Ultimately, the individuals you match up will make their own decisions about the future. Your role is simply to make the match.

Mostly, don't be afraid to offer assistance. Many single people will really appreciate the help.

Loneliness is tough, especially in the Jewish community, where events, holidays and general culture are designed to centre around the family. Be a matchmaker! When you facilitate a bond of love, you become a partner in it.

Consider that God spent as much energy bringing together man and woman as he did creating the heavens and the earth. This is an incredible concept, and speaks to the depth of love, adoration and companionship within Judaism.

Apple Butterscotch Squares

3 large apples, grated
1/2 cup margarine
3/4 cup brown sugar
2 eggs
1/2 cup sour cream
1/2 cup 2% milk
1 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cup whole wheat flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1/8 tsp. salt
1 cup butterscotch chips

Preheat oven to 350°F. Sprinkle apple with a little lemon juice to prevent browning. Cream margarine and sugar until sugar is dissolved. Blend in eggs, sour cream, milk and vanilla. Sift flour & salt together in a separate bowl and gradually add into creamed mixture. Add grated apples and butterscotch chips. Spread batter into 9" square baking pan which has been coated lightly with cooking spray. Bake 45 minutes or until browned. Cook and cut into 24 squares.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband and I are miffed about the actions of two close friends of ours. They are having a bar mitzvah and have not invited us.

Let me give you a bit of background so you can understand. We have been friends with these people for close to 20 years. They have attended all of our simchahs and we have attended all of theirs – until now. We have small children the same age and belong to the same playgroup.

Granted we don't see them as much as we used to, but both our families have grown to have very busy schedules. That shouldn't mean that we aren't friends. Nothing ever happened between us to cause bad feelings. My husband is very hurt and the more he talks about it, the more I can see a permanent split in this friendship. Should we leave it alone or confront them?

Dear Feeling Left Out

Without knowing all the facts, I can understand your immediate feeling of resentment.

As you know from having made simchahs yourself, there is much thought that goes into each detail, including the invitation list. Many factors are taken into account: cost, space, special circumstances, family feuds etc.

You won't get a clear-cut answer without speaking to them. After having a 20-year relationship with these people, there is no reason why you can't ask. Give them the benefit of the doubt. There was probably a reason that you won't know about until you speak to each other.

The one thing you do have to do is get your feelings in check before you speak. Don't be confrontational or accusatory, as that will only make them uncomfortable, and they probably feel that way now. This does not have to mean the end of a long friendship. After getting an explanation, I'm sure you'll be able to put this behind you.

Workers mull leaving CUPE Ontario

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Employees at Jewish agencies affiliated with the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) are reconsidering their membership in the Ontario branch of the Canada-wide union.

Lil Nobel, president of local 2063, which represents 80 workers at the UJA Federation and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), said the local has been upset by the union's position on the Mideast conflict. The recent appearance of a CUPE official carrying a CUPE flag at a rally protesting a Toronto speaking engagement by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was the last straw, she said.

Janice Shaw, president of local 265, which represents 90 workers at the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) said "we are investigating a number of possibilities and leaving CUPE Ontario is one of them... There is a lot of grumbling" by local members, she added.

Argentinian influx expected in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Montreal Jewish community is preparing to receive "thousands" of immigrants over the next year or two, mainly from Argentina and France, says FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings.

Cummings is so confident that Montreal will be the destination of an immigration wave, the likes of which has not been seen since the postwar years, that he believes the Jewish community may well double its approximately 100,000 members over the next 10 years. It would be a dramatic reversal for a community that has been in decline century.

Cummings would not be more precise about how many thousands are expected, but a FEDERATION CJA strategic plan aims to absorb 10,000 immigrants annually.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Envoy Heads to Israel

TORONTO — A representative of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee left for Israel last week for the first Israeli International Humanitarian Aid Conference, held on Kibbutz Yakum near Netanya, organized by the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid (Israid). Ve'ahavta program director Rachel Lasry was to join members of the 35 other Jewish and Israeli relief groups expected to attend. She was to announce the launch of a new Tikkun Olam Online News Bulletin, a Web site that will provide updates on the activities of Jewish aid and relief groups around the globe.

ISRAEL

Prize for Alert Guard

TEL AVIV — An alert security guard who prevented a recent suicide attack in Tel Aviv has received a $5,000 (US) reward from a Swiss Jewish millionaire who had promised to honour civilians who prevent terror attacks. Michael Sarkisov stopped a bomber from entering a cafe near the city's crowded beachfront promenade. The man then bolted toward the nearby U.S. Embassy. Sarkisov, assisted by other security guards, wrestled him to the ground and bound his arms and legs so he could not set off his charge.

Lien on PA Funds

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has placed a $16-million (US) lien on tax money Israel owes the Palestinian Authority following a request from the family of Israeli soldier Vadim Norjitz. He and another soldier, Yossi Avrahami, were lynched in October 2000 by a mob in a PA police station in Ramallah. Israel has frozen some $400 million owed to the PA for customs duties on Palestinian imports. Norjitz's family sued both Israel's finance ministry and the PA. Though the court has yet to rule on the case, it placed the lien so that funds would be available if his family wins a judgment against the PA.

Rabbi Blasts Lawyer

SAFED — The chief rabbi here has issued a ruling that forbids praying in a minyan with Shamai Leibowitz, the Israeli lawyer who is part of the defence team representing Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti, who is accused of planning numerous terror attacks on Israelis. Rabbi Shmuel Eliahu made the ruling in reply to a question by someone who wanted to know if it would be permissible to curse Leibowitz if he came to the local shul.

WORLD

Alleged Nazi Guard

WASHINGTON D.C. — The U.S. Justice Department wants to revoke the citizenship of an Ohio man accused of guarding Nazi concentration camps. Jakob Miling, 78, is charged with obtaining U.S. citizenship illegally by concealing his service as a Nazi guard. The department alleges Miling manned machine-gun posts at the Sachsenhausen camp and later served in the SS at the Gross-Rosen camp.

Goldhagen vs. Church

BERLIN — Scholar Daniel Goldhagen says Germany's Roman Catholic Church is trying to stop the publication of his new book in order to cover up its role in the Holocaust. Acting on complaints of an incorrect photo caption, a German court recently issued a recall of some of the books in Germany. Goldhagen called the move an attempt to "avoid a real discussion." A Moral Reckoning: The Role of the Catholic Church During the Holocaust is to be released Oct. 29 in North America.

Writing Contest

NEW YORK — The Coalition for Advancement of Jewish Education is offering $1,000 (US) in prizes in the 13th annual David Dornstein Memorial Creative Writing Contest for Young Adult Writers. Authors 18 to 35 can submit a short story on a Jewish theme or topic by Dec. 31. Details at www.caje.org.

Insurance Agreement

WASHINGTON D.C. — A new deal will release insurance payments to German Holocaust survivors. Representatives of German insurance companies and the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims signed an agreement last week that will trigger the release of $100 million (US) to pay claims against German companies and $175 million for humanitarian projects. Former Jewish residents of Germany and their heirs will also be able to view a list of policies issued to Jewish residents of Germany during the Nazi era.

Nimoy Dropped From Fund-raiser

SEATTLE — The Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle dropped actor Leonard Nimoy from its Oct. 23 fund-raiser because of images in his book of photographs.

The cover for Nimoy's book, Shekhina, shows a woman wearing tfillin; her right breast is visible through a translucent garment.

The work is entirely "reverential," Nimoy told the Associated Press. "It's a photographic essay on the subject of the Shechinah, which is the feminine presence of God, the feminine aspect of divinity."

He said he had little choice. "If you were running a charity fund-raising dinner and there were going to be images of naked women or naked women with Jewish ritual objects draped on them, that might be offensive to some folks." Comedian Al Franken was booked as a replacement.

Child survivors gather to celebrate life

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

They came to Toronto to sing, cling to one another, celebrate life and, most of all, commit to educating future generations.

An atmosphere normally seen at large family reunions permeated last week's gathering of those who were hidden as children during the Holocaust, and of children of Holocaust survivors.

Umbrella group launched for Holocaust survivors

Please see page 20

Some 350 one-time hidden children from across North America, Europe and Israel joined about 150 members of the second generation for the 2½ day conference, staged annually by the World Federation of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust.

Those in attendance at the Regal Constellation Hotel embraced and caught up on family news like members of a long-lost clan. The "children," now in their 60s and 70s, laughed, reminisced, shared and even shed the odd tear.

The warmth and camaraderie, however, did not detract from the emotional intensity that shot through the conference. Those who suffered through the Holocaust as children, whether in hiding, in ghettos, on the run, or in concentration camps, were especially vulnerable given the trauma they experienced in such formative years.

The array of workshops and seminars, some led by psychologists and social workers, explored whether trauma is transmitted through generations; physical and sexual abuse of child survivors; being orphaned after the war; parenting styles; and facing the prospect of aging and death.

But straddling those themes was the need to pass on the legacy of survival to the next generation, even if it means unlocking painful memories.

And children of survivors also have a special duty, the conference heard.

"The responsibility of the second generation is to be witnesses to our parents. We have a profound, solemn obligation to perpetuate survivors' work and to ensure their message will continue to be heard," Menachem Rosensaft, a well-known U.S. Holocaust educator and activist, told the wrap-up session last Monday morning.

"We have a moral authority to ensure that the Holocaust will be written into contemporary history from the perspective of the victims, and not exclusively from the perspective of the perpetrators," Rosensaft stated.

Some speakers at the session voiced concern that with a new rise in anti-Semitism, a sense of doom is again enveloping the Jewish world.

"Don't panic. It's not 1933 or 1938," advised Nathan Durst, clinical director of AMCHA, an Israeli organization that provides psycho-social outreach and services to Holocaust survivors. "We have to learn not to panic. Let's be aware of what's going on, and united. Not everyone loves us, but life is worth living."

Durst addressed the issue of identity loss among survivors.

"Our story is not just the story of the Holocaust. Our story is thousands of years of heritage and roots. If we forget that, we forget large parts of our identity."

Jehudi Lindeman, who, as a child, spent three years in hiding in Holland, also acknowledged that all Holocaust survivors have a heightened fear of being pursued.

One way to counter that, he suggested, is to "disturb" the world.

New Jewish scholarship

From the editor's desk

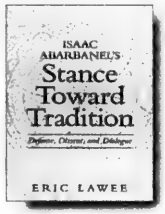
The relatively recent increase in the offerings of Jewish studies at Canadian universities has been an important development for the Jewish and, indeed, for the general Canadian community.

Especially exciting for both the academy and the public has been the opportunity afforded to teachers of Jewish studies to advance the state of Jewish scholarship.

During the past year, two new significant works by young, fresh, dynamic scholars teaching at Canadian universities have appeared. It is our delight to bring those works to the attention of our readers.

* * *

Eric Lawee is assistant professor of humanities at York University in Toronto. He has written Isaac Abarbanel's Stance Toward Tradition: Defense, Dissent and Dialogue, a boon to anyone interested in Jewish and European history, philosophy, biblical exegesis and rabbinics, to name but a few of the rich veins of Jewish and other scholarship this engaging text mines.



Lawee has devoted the large part of his academic training and research to medieval and early modern Judaism and Jewish history, focusing in particular on the work of the 15th- and early 16th-century intellectual giant, Isaac Abarbanel (1437-1508).

Abarbanel was a rare, commanding figure. He served as an advisor in the royal courts of Portugal, Spain and Italy. His service to the King and Queen of Spain became the stuff of legend.

Even as the Spanish rulers were signing the decree of expulsion against the Jews in 1492, they pleaded with Abarbanel to stay behind. But he refused, preferring to march with his co-religionists in search of yet another new home rather than remain behind in the service of the villainous monarchs. The dislocations in his life mirrored the migrations of the wandering Jews as they were cast out from country after country.

Lawee places Abarbanel at the critical crossroads of the dawning of modern western civilization: "The life of this celebrated courtier-financier and scholar, who passed the majority of his years in Portugal but wrote nearly all of his works in Spain and Italy, intersected some of the most important and influential intellectual, religious, historical, political and technological trends and transitions of late medieval and early modern times."

At the outset of the work, Lawee tells the reader, "The book's main goal is a discriminating portrait of a specific religious, personality living at a captivating historical moment when 'the Middle Ages and the Renaissance were yet indistinct.'" But in truth, Lawee's purpose is rather narrower. It is to explore Abarbanel's views about following tradition.

Abarbanel, a profound thinker and prolific biblical commentator, was deeply anchored within the parameters of traditional, observant Judaism. Yet he was never reluctant to challenge the interpretations of contemporaries or even of ancient forebears. "Abarbanel's approach to sacrosanct figures and his readings of classical Jewish texts could be decidedly... nay, provocatively, 'untraditional.'"

What are the lessons, if any, that we can cull and apply from Abarbanel's innovative, critical approaches to what he considered problematic Jewish thinking?

Lawee's language is engaging, accessible to the layman as well as to the scholar, occasionally even tending to memorable turns of literary phrase. He has meticulously crafted a window from which we can look upon the life, times and thought of Isaac Abarbanel. What we are able to see through that window may share similar outlines with some of the issues dominating the Jewish horizon visible through the windows of our own times.

Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment: Deciphering Scripture and Midrash in The Guide of the Perplexed, by James Arthur Diamond, is more of a specialist's text. It delves into the manner in which Maimonides relied upon midrash to organize and convey his thoughts in his grand work, The Guide of the Perplexed.

"This study," Diamond writes, "shall confine itself to Maimonides' use of midrashic and scriptural prooftexts in the Guide and demonstrate that his expositions of many topics and issues in the Guide are implicity rooted in complex, multilayered readings of midrash and Scripture."

The book is undoubtedly a welcome addition for Maimonides scholars.

Diamond holds the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo. Recently, as reported in The CJN, he was appointed to direct a team of scholars from a consortium of universities to study the remaining contents of the Cairo Genizah.

Jewish workers consider leaving CUPE Ontario

In a letter to CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan, Nobel described "the collective shock and dismay" of the workers at several Jewish agencies that the CUPE flag would appear at the rally.

Nobel said she was told by a national CUPE official the flag had been stolen or was missing and there would be an investigation into the circumstances of its appearance at the protest.

Later however, the National Post reported that the individual who carried the flag, Ken Theobald, who is president of a large CUPE local in Toronto, said he did not take the flag without authorization and that the union permits use of the CUPE flag at demonstrations, if they are in line with CUPE policy.

That position was supported by Ryan, who said Theobald did nothing wrong in using the flag. Ryan, however, distanced himself from Theobald's statements criticizing Netanyahu, saying "I would never in a million years come out and make those accusations."

In the Post interview, Theobald called Netanyahu a "blatant racist against Arab people" and he compared the former Israeli prime minister to the Ku Klux Klan.

Nobel said her local now feels itself "a minority" in the CUPE family. "My executive and myself are in the middle of trying to figure out what we'll do in regard to CUPE Ontario. We are a member of CUPE Ontario. We don't have to be. We can withdraw from CUPE Ontario" though the local would retain an association with the union's national wing, she said.

Local 2063 has met with representatives of other workers at Jewish agencies, including JF&CS, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and JIAS, where the flag issue was raised and strategies discussed. The locals, which represent 400 employees in total, are all considering whether to remain in CUPE Ontario, Nobel said.

Ryan said such a departure would be a mistake: "The way to change [CUPE] policy is to participate and not withdraw."

He blamed Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) for influencing Nobel's views and for attempting to drive a wedge between the local and CUPE Ontario. "Her views are fueled by CJC," he said.

Referring specifically to Bernie Farber, executive-director of Congress' Ontario region, Ryan said Farber had put the option of "dis-affiliation" on the table at a recent meeting of the local executive. (Farber denied the suggestion CJC introduced the dis-affiliation option to the locals. "It was union representatives from the locals who sought our advice, who sought our opinion. Nothing was fuelled by CJC," he said.)

"CJC is beginning to show itself as anti-union," Ryan said. "That's why they're going to have problems down the road.

Ryan described CUPE's position on the Mideast conflict as balanced, opposing both Palestinian suicide bombing and Israeli aggression. Theobald, he continued, represented only his personal views at the anti-Netanyahu rally. CUPE is not a homogenous organization, Ryan said. "Ken is his own person. He makes his own statement."

Farber said Theobald's appearance at the protest, held one day after violent protesters shut down a speaking engagement by Netanyahu at Concordia University in Montreal, led to questions whether CUPE supported the protester.

"To refer to Benjamin Netanyahu as a racist and a KKK is as offensive [a statement] as any I can think of," Farber said. "Is this CUPE's position?"

Farber said "there is a sense in the Jewish community, not just in the centre of the political spectrum, but also on the Jewish left… that they have been abandoned because they are Zionists and supporters of the State of Israel. They feel abandoned by the trade union movement and the political left. It's a huge problem and this is a small particle of it."

Ryan said Congress has been outmanoeuvred by Palestinian advocates in Canada and public opinion favours the Palestinian position in Canada and around the world.

"We need to speak up whenever we see injustice and abuse in the world," said Lindeman, now an English professor at McGill University in Montreal.

He would extend that concern to Palestinians, and the discussion veered sharply when Lindeman called on Israel to "get rid" of Jewish settlements, "which are too close to Ramallah, Nablus and Hebron."

That prompted jeers and shouts of protest.

"We Jews are entitled to be there," yelled one woman.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," remarked one man.

The episode shone a light on how passionately Holocaust survivors regard Israel as a haven, balanced with legitimate concern for the downtrodden of the world.

Rosensaft said he too feels for Palestinians. "However, when hate is directed at us; when women and children are expendable, I become more of a chauvinist. I'm not prepared to turn the other cheek," he said to wide applause.

Survivors, he said, have to choose their issues carefully.

"If we speak out on every issue, we speak out on none."

Lindeman defended himself by saying he "is not in the peace camp, not making a political statement and not advocating [Israel's] unilateral withdrawal [from Jewish settlements]."

However, the hatred many Palestinians feel toward Jews "is a result of a policy of colonization," a statement that drew more jeers.

The session dissolved into spontaneous singing of Hatikvah and Am Yisrael Chai.

Participants linked arms for more songs, and pledged to meet again next year.

CJC, Women's Bookstore resolve button issue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent meeting between representatives of the Toronto Women's Bookstore, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and other members of the Jewish community proved fruitful, says Rachael Turkienicz, chair of CJC's social action committee.

The meeting was called after tempers in the Jewish community flared over the bookstore's display of pro-Palestinian buttons, and its refusal to display buttons offered by CJC and National Council of Jewish Women's Toronto section that read, "Stop the Homicide Bombings."

Turkienicz, a York University professor and CJN columnist, said those at the meeting decided to work together to design a new button that will get the message across clearly and sensitively that both sides have the right to exist in peace and safety.

She said that at the meeting, it became clear that the "bookstore people had waded into territories that were complex.

"They had not understood the kind of hurt [the buttons] portrayed, and they had not anticipated or understood the Jewish community's reaction."

Anjula Gogia, co-manager of the bookstore said the meeting cleared up a lot of misunderstandings.

"There was a lot of confusion out there, and our position was not accurately reflected.

"We call for peace with justice in Israel and Palestine, and we denounce violence. We condemn suicide bombings... we do not support the killing of civilians in any conflict.

"We are a political bookstore. We carry a wide array of political buttons, addressing issues of violence against women, poverty, police brutality, the Tory government, homelessness ... and the list goes on," Gogia said in a press release.

She insisted that the bookstore has "no room for anti-Semitism or racism, and that it continues to work with Jewish and Palestinian women to create a space that allows for dialogue about complex issues."

Turkienicz said we need to realize that when making statements, it is important to be aware that issues are never straight forward or simple.

"The women who represented the bookstore were made aware of the sensitivities, and they were open and eager to address them. I give them credit for that," she said.

Jewish Book Fair caters to all ages

Plans for this year's Jewish Book Fair, which runs from Nov. 2 to Nov. 10 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Leah Posluns Theatre, began the day last year's fair closed, says its director Helen Redner.

Together with her board of about 27 members, Redner says, she has been reading books and book reviews all year in preparation for the 26th annual fair, sponsored by Koffler Centre of the Arts.

"We don't go with a theme; we try to find books – this year there should be about 8,000 – and plan programs that cater to every age, every interest."

Putting together the fair is like setting up a bookstore, she says. "Volunteers keep track of the books, unpack boxes, lay out books, hand out brochures, take cash – it's a huge job."

The fair's opening night features a talk, The Truth About Terrorism, by John Loftus, former justice department prosecutor, first Irish Catholic president of the Florida Holocaust Museum, and author of The Secret War Against the Jews.

One of the fair's highlights, says Redner, is the Nov. 10 talk by Roma Ligocka, author of The Girl in the Red Coat.

Ligocka, a child survivor of the Holocaust who was depicted in Schindler's List, will talk about her memoir of survival and self-discovery.

Other speakers include Mennett Muraskin, who will speak on his book Humanist Readings in Jewish Folklore; Rosalie Wise Sharp, author of Ceramics, Ethics and Scandal: The Rosalie and Isadore Sharp Collection; Bill Stern, author of You Don't Have to be Jewish; N.N. Shneidman, author of The Three Tragic Heroes of the Vilnus Ghetto; and Sondra Gotlieb, author of Life with a Jewish Flavour.

Poet Nancy-Gay Rotstein will read from her poetry book This Horizon and Beyond: Poems Selected and New.

In another program, Henry Aubin, author of The Rescue of Jerusalem; Eric Lawee, author of Isaac Aberbanel's Stance Toward Tradition; and Allan Levine, author of Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits will talk on Significant Moments in Jewish History.

In a children's program, Karen Levine will talk about Hana's Suitcase, a book inspired by a suitcase that arrived at a children's Holocaust education centre in Tokyo. With Levine will be Fumiko Ishioka, the centre's curator, and George Brady, Hana's brother.

Also for children ages seven and over, students at Dr. Abraham Shore Shearim Hebrew Day School and Sam Hennick Education Centre will perform The Magic Pan.

Scholar suggests compromise over Jerusalem

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As far as international hot-button issues are concerned, the question of Jerusalem is certainly one of the hottest.

A city holy to the three monotheistic faiths, control over its future remains hotly contested, with both Jews and Muslims claiming it as their eternal capital.

For Reuven Firestone, professor of medieval Judaism and Islam at Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Los Angeles, politics and religion are always intertwined when it comes to Jerusalem. Nevertheless, he believes, the future of Jerusalem will be resolved eventually.

"There are ways to solve the problem," he said, "but this is not the time given the climate."

Firestone, an ordained rabbi, was in Southern Ontario last week to address a number of Reform congregations as well as an audience at McMaster University. At a Shabbaton study session and lunch at the Holy Blossom Temple, he discussed the topic: "Whose Jerusalem? The Holy City in Judaism, Christianity and Islam."

He was also scheduled to address congregations at Temple Emanu-el, Temple Har Zion in Toronto and a group at McMaster University in Hamilton, on the topic of divine authority for violent acts. From Toronto, he was to travel to the University of Massachusetts and New York City for further speaking engagements.

Though Jerusalem is holy to three faiths, Christianity has only a small role to play in its future disposition, he said. The sanctity of Jerusalem for Christians remains an individual affair and there are no Christian states with claims on the city.

For Jews and Muslims, however, the future of the city remains a point of contention. Firestone believes it can be resolved by both sides giving a little.

"The majority of Jews could live without full and complete control of Jerusalem if they could be assured of full and free access to the holy places," he said. Similarly, "most Muslims and even Palestinians would go for the same approach as long as they can be assured of full and complete access."

A resolution is certainly not imminent, he continued, given the "divide" between the two sides and "the total and complete breakdown of faith on both sides."

What's more, "there are Jews and Muslims who are totally opposed to compromise," he acknowledged.

Firestone, who lectures on a variety of topics that concern relations between Jews, Muslims and the Mideast conflict, believes both sides tend to minimize the other's attachment to Jerusalem. Some Jews believe Jerusalem is not holy to Muslims while Muslims believe Jews have distorted history to show it is sacred to them when it is not. (Yasser Arafat famously told President Bill Clinton at Camp David that Judaism's holy temple never stood in Jerusalem.)

"Both sides tend to diminish the feelings of the other side," Firestone said.

As far as he is concerned, it's irrelevant whether Mohammed ever visited Jerusalem and ascended from there to heaven, and it's impossible to try to prove that Abraham intended to sacrifice Isaac on the site of today's Temple Mount.

"I think it's a futile project. It doesn't do any good. The better response is to accept the other's attachment to Jerusalem," he said.

Firestone is author of Journeys in Holy Lands: The Evolution of the Abraham-Ishmael Legends in Islamic Exegesis; Jihad: The Origin of Holy War in Islam and Children of Abraham: An Introduction to Judaism for Muslims.

Suicide bombings political, not religious: Palestinian prof

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Suicide bombing attacks are an expression of Palestinian frustration rather than an act of religious conviction, academic Muhammed Abu Samra said at a recent event hosted by Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Faced with grim economic and political realities, many Palestinians have become hopeless, leading some to commit heinous murderous acts, Abu Samra, a professor at Al Quds University and the David Yellin College of Education in Jerusalem, told the audience at a discussion titled, "To Die For? Judaism and Islam on Martyrdom."

Tzvi Howard Adelman, a professor at Hebrew University, opened the evening with an examination of suicide and martyrdom from a Jewish perspective, using Masada as his main point of reference.

Adelman contended that Jewish tradition does not preclude committing suicide for religious and political purposes. "It's Islam today that's often associated with martyrs, suicide bombers and shaheeds," he said. "The fact is we're dealing with a phenomenon that has deep roots among the Jews."

But the focal point of the evening was Abu Samra's speech and the reaction of audience members to his arguments. Several audience members questioned Samra's assertions in a charged question-and-answer session that followed the professors' discourse.

How sad to look now upon CUPE

The appearance of the CUPE Ontario flag at the demonstration last month in Toronto against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu is the latest and saddest evidence of the shallow waters in which that union is now swimming. The Toronto demonstration against Netanyahu occurred the day after anti-Israeli thugs vandalized Concordia University in downtown Montreal and roughed up a number of people trying to get into the hall to hear the former prime minister. The hooligans prevented Netanyahu from speaking at the school. In effect, therefore, they also vandalized key cornerstone values underpinning Canadian democracy.

On the very next day, the CUPE Ontario flag was prominently displayed among the banners and slogans that branded Israel an apartheid state. While itself an example of the free speech that Canadian society cherishes, that accusation in particular is outrageous, vile and dangerous, yet ever since the Durban anti-racism conference in September 2001, one of the most-commonly invoked calumnies against the Jewish State.

CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan told The CJN that the flag-waver, Ken Theobald, president of one of the largest CUPE locals in Toronto, represented "only his personal views" at the demonstration. But this explanation was as disingenuous as it was inconsistent with plain common sense. If the view expressed by Theobald was only a personal one, then the use of the flag was indeed inappropriate, and egregiously so. As we all know, by the very nature of the act, the use of the union's flag was intended to clearly and publicly ally the union to the cause scrawled on the signs and banners in that anti-Israel protest.

And what was that cause? Let there be no mistaking its true aim. Let there also be no condoning the sly attempt by CUPE Ontario leaders to hide or obfuscate its true aim. The logic of the haters of Israel is as simple as it is distorted: Israel is an apartheid state. It must be treated in the same manner as the only other apartheid state was ever treated. It must be dismantled! By joining with the hate-filled slogans being hurled at Israel, the union was de facto supporting, condoning and even affirming the call for the elimination of the Jewish State. However much he equivocated on the issue of the use of his union's flag, Ryan cannot escape the truth of what its appearance at that rally meant.

Ryan's predecessors in the Canadian labour movement would have condemned, with all their might, CUPE's morally inverted actions.

"Israel is like a light set upon a hill, the light of democracy in a night of darkness," the late, venerated Tommy Douglas said in 1975. "You and I and fellow trade unionists," he said the following year, "have a responsibility to stand with [Israel], to speak out for [Israel], to ally ourselves with [Israelis] and to try to get trade unionists the world around to stand together and say, these people shall not die; this light shall not go out."

How vacuous Ryan's words are in comparison to Douglas' ringing declarations. How sad that CUPE stands now for what was once so odious.

A portentous, sad anniversary

The 64th anniversary of the deportation back to Poland of Polish Jews residing in Germany is Oct. 28.

The deportation by train of some 17,000 men, women and children was carried out in a brutal and ruthless manner. Eventually, the Polish government closed the border and several trains had to return to their home cities. Most of the deportees to Poland perished in the Shoah.

Among the deportees were the parents of Herschel Grynszpan from Hanover. Seventeen-year-old Herschel, who lived in Paris, was very upset about the deportation of his parents. He obtained a gun and on Nov. 7, 1938, went to the German Embassy and shot and mortally wounded an embassy official, Ernst von Rath. Von Rath died a day later.

This assassination was the pretext for Kristallnacht on the night of Nov. 9, 1938. The Nazis were looking for an excuse to start more vigorous persecution of Jews and they found it.

What many Jews in Germany and Europe did not see at that time were the thickening black clouds of the imminent catastrophe, the Holocaust.

Seeking an accounting

I am grateful to Leslie Vertes for calling my attention to the good deeds performed by the Claims Conference (CJN, Letters, Oct. 10). Indeed, the organization is in dire need of favourable publicity.

But since the Cummings Centre receives an abundance of annual reports published by the Claims Conference, would Vertes be kind enough to share with me one particular annual report? I am referring to the annual report that contains a ledger that has three columns: one column lists the sums of the money received and their source; adjoining it is the column that lists the allocations and their recipients; the third column provides a rationale for the allocations. Proper accounting also keeps a journal that is a quarterly summary of the various financial expenses. This journal also shows the maintenance expenses such as salaries, travel, per diem expenses and executive benefits.

Among the materials the Cummings Centre has received there must be one that gives a coherent definition of a survivor. The conference's present practice by which moneys are disbursed qualifies Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright to receive restitution funds. Without a working definition of survivorship, the money is allocated at the whim of the conference.

Denies he was key organizer

I was surprised to read Janice Arnold's statement that I was "one of the group's key organizers" of the protests that shut down Benjamin Netanyahu's planned Sept. 9 lecture at Concordia University, in the article "Questions raised about Montreal visit" (CJN, Sept.19).

Had she chosen to speak to me, she would have discovered that I had no part whatsoever in the event and was out of the country for two weeks prior to the protests. My only connection to that day, in fact, had occurred over a month earlier when, at the request of Concordia Hillel, I had acted with another member of the Concordia Student Union Executive and given up our booking for the auditorium where Netanyahu would have appeared.

Says Israel is a pariah state

In the Editor's Desk column of Oct. 10, Mordechai Ben-Dat complains that Israel is seen as a "racist, colonial, terrorist, pariah state." In fact, it is. This has been a topic of discussion and fear among progressive Israelis, even among the Labour party establishment. It is no more anti-Semitic to state nearly uncontestable facts about the Ariel Sharon government than it is anti-Muslim to speak of the actions of Iran or Taliban-Afghanistan. Most Jews privately concede that Sharon is not good for the Jews.

Even by the most conservative estimates, Israel proper, discounting the occupation, has racist tendencies. Racism is not directed only against Palestinians, known to Israelis as "Arab Israelis," who even in "calm" times have never enjoyed the same de jure rights as Jews. Through a combination of Europhile elitism and top-down statism, Sephardim have also always felt discriminated against, and have been a target for the reactionary populism of the Likud.

Israel is quite literally colonial. This is not a value-laden term. Even accepting the legitimacy of pre-1967 Israel, which no one denies at this point, the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip are quite literally colonialist.

Israel is unfortunately also a pariah state, like the United States or Iraq. Any state that detracts from global equilibrium will be deemed by the rest of the world a pariah.

This has nothing to do with religion. Indeed, if the original Zionist ethic was to normalize the Jewish people within the context of 19th-century nationalism, Israel has been normalized by its extreme misbehaviour, not yet placing itself within the ranks of France, Germany or the United States, but far surpassing most of the Third World in its brutal "normalization."

Perspectives

College ad misses the point

By SUSANNAH HESCHEL

As a historian of Jewish-Christian relations in Germany, and as a professor who has taught at several German universities, hostility toward Jews and Judaism in university settings is nothing new to me.

Yet the recent New York Times ad condemning anti-Semitism at American colleges neither reflects the reality of most campuses nor provides assistance to those of us in Jewish studies.

The full-page ad, based on a petition signed by 300 university presidents and sponsored by the American Jewish Committee (AJC) and signed by 300 university presidents, might actually harm Jewish studies at universities.

The ad calls for campus debates without "threats, taunts or intimidation" – which all of us support – but fails to define what constitutes intimidation. Its vagueness may be why so many university presidents, including Harvard's Lawrence Summers, refused to sign it.

Nothing stated in the ad is a problem; the problem is what is not stated. For example, it declares: "In the past few months, students who are Jewish or supporters of Israel's right to exist – Zionists – have received death threats and threats of violence." It then speaks of Jewish property that is being "defaced or destroyed."

No responsible citizen supports threats and violence against persons and property. All of us condemn anti-Semitism.

The problem is defining intimidation when it stops well short of rejecting Israel's existence or threatening Jews with violence. When does criticism of Israeli government actions cease to be a legitimate expression of political opinion and become anti-Semitism? How can we Jews speak out on behalf of human rights for Palestinians as well as Israelis and not be labelled traitors?

What's missing is help with a pervasive problem many Jewish professors and students face: intimidation and threats from other Jews. Many of us on campus are deeply critical of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and yet we are strong Zionists. We believe in a two-state solution for reasons of politics, security and morality.

Thus we face two battles: defending Israel to those who oppose Israel's right to exist, and arguing our political views to right-wing Israelis, Jews and, increasingly, Christians. We often hear that criticism of Israel is equivalent to anti-Semitism – which, if true, would turn most Jews and Israelis into anti-Semites.

Ironically, the nasty comments I have received on campus came from right-wing Jewish students and faculty who were angry at me for publicly siding with Israel's Labor party platform and opposing Sharon. Jewish colleagues and students at other institutions have also reported being threatened by fellow Jews after criticizing Israeli policies. I've also heard about boycotts of Jewish professors critical of Israel that have been organized by Jewish students and faculty. And scholars who are accused by Daniel Pipes on his "Campus Watch" Web site of siding with Arabs or criticizing Israel have no opportunity to defend themselves, and the evidence against them is not contextualized.

The most common difficulties faced by Jewish professors are not violence or physical intimidation – which are quickly addressed by campus security – but the isolation we often experience in our support for Israel. In my experience, it is often Arab and Muslim students who most appreciate our concern to create peace for both Israel and a future Palestinian state.

But as much as peace needs to be negotiated between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, we need to negotiate peace on our campuses.

Neither the AJC newspaper ad nor Pipes' Web site assist us. Instead, they inhibit conversation through intimidation. No one wants to be misunderstood as an anti-Semite; better not to talk. A common fear expressed by my colleagues in Jewish studies is that if they express any criticism of Israel, funding will be withdrawn from their programs – not by their universities, but by the local Jewish community. That kind of anxiety is intolerable in a university setting, which can thrive only on a free exchange of ideas.

It's very well to spend thousands of dollars for a full-page newspaper ad or Web site, but it would have been far more useful to articulate how a Zionist can be legitimately critical of some Israeli government policies, support a Palestinian state and worry about the human rights and political futures of all people.

There is no peace for one side in a conflict; there is either peace for all or peace for none.

Fight campus anti-Semitism

By ALAN DERSHOWITZ

I applaud the 300 college and university presidents who signed the ad organized by the former president of Dartmouth, James Freedman, that expressed concern over "intimidation and hatred" directed against Jewish supporters of Israel on many campuses. I wish more presidents had joined in this condemnation of a dangerous form of bigotry that is now prevalent on campus.

As a professor who has long supported both human rights issues and Israel, I have received numerous phone calls, letters, e-mails and faxes from Jewish students around the country who are fearful for their safety and worried that anti-Israel professors will punish them for their support of Israel.

The fear is real. It is especially true since the campaign to divest from Israel and to boycott all Israeli Jews has heated up over the last several months. Any professor willing to punish Israeli colleagues just because of their national origin may well be willing to punish students who support the Jewish State.

Some argue that the presidents' ad will chill campus debate. But quite the opposite is true. The ad, along with Harvard President Lawrence Summers' statement that the campaign to urge universities to divest themselves of holdings in Israel is anti-Semitic, has stimulated healthy debate. Those who argue otherwise rely on the red herring that any criticism of Israel is immediately labelled anti-Semitic.

Susannah Heschel's claim – "We often hear that criticism of Israel is equivalent to anti-Semitism" – is simply not true. I challenge Heschel to back up that falsehood with hard evidence. I have never heard that accusation made. I am often critical of Israeli actions. But neither I, nor other critics of the Sharon government or supporters of Palestinian statehood, have ever been accused of being anti-Semitic.

Summers went out of his way to make it clear that criticism of Israel is not anti-Semitic, either in intent or effect. No one I know is seeking to stifle criticism of Israel or of the current government, or to chill support for Palestinian statehood and human rights.

What is the equivalent of anti-Semitism is the singling out of the Jewish nation for divestment, boycott, UN condemnation or other sanctions, despite its far better record on human rights than any other nation in the Middle East and most other nations in the world.

It is certainly possible that some who have signed the divestiture or boycott petitions do not believe their actions are anti-Semitic. They may not realize they are being used by Israel's enemies to delegitimize and isolate the world's only Jewish nation.

The recent campaigns for divestiture and boycott grow out of two earlier campaigns that were undoubtedly motivated by a desire to destroy Israel. The first was the Arab boycott, which lasted for many years and was finally defeated. The second was the now discredited UN resolution equating Zionism with racism.

The current efforts to equate Israel with the apartheid regime of South Africa will also fail, because the analogy is false. The goal of this campaign is not actually to achieve divestiture, but rather to miseducate college students into believing that Israel is among the worst human rights violators in the world, despite its great concern for minimizing civilian casualties by exposing its own soldiers to the risks of door-to-door fighting rather than resorting to wholesale bombing.

The fact that Israel is the only Mideast country with freedom of expression, an independent judiciary and a commitment to the equality of women and gays is ignored in this effort to isolate Israel. Ignorance may be a defence to bigotry, but it has no place on a university campus.

The immoral campaign on campuses against Jews who support Israel must be fought. The presidents' letter is an important component of this struggle against bigotry. Too many good people are remaining silent in the face of anti-Semitism. It is time to stand up and be counted.

The origins of the campus ad

By KENNETH STERN

I had quite an education this summer helping a group of college and university presidents circulate a statement calling for "intimidation-free campuses."

The statement grew out of a discussion with five presidents about a series of incidents in which Jewish students had been victimized on a campus. Jewish property had been vandalized and Jewish students had been taunted with anti-Semitic chants and threatened with death. Some Jewish students said they were steering away from certain Mideast-related courses and professors, concerned that speaking out in favour of Israel would result in lower grades.

The drafters included a paragraph about attacks on Jewish students, but the guarantee of an "intimidation-free" campus applied to all groups.

While many presidents were quick to sign, others declined. One, a Jew, did not like the word "Zionist" in the text. Others feared signing would be taken as an admission that there were problems on their campuses. A handful of presidents, including one of the original signers, had another concern that came to light after more than 200 of their colleagues had already joined: the statement did not specifically include Arab students.

There was no way to change it at that point, but I agreed with the drafters that even if we could have changed it, there was no reason to do so. Arab students, indeed all students, were clearly covered by the statement as written. And while Jewish students and supporters of Israel were certainly active on campus, violence and intimidation were coming in one direction. The same week one of the original signers pulled out, violence by pro-Palestinian students prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking at Concordia University in Montreal. Shortly thereafter, Jewish property was defaced at the University of Colorado at Boulder. To have made the statement "symmetrical" in this environment would not only have created an immoral equivalency, it would also have revised the narrative of the troubling facts that gave rise to the statement in the first place.

After Sept. 11, college presidents and most human rights organizations spoke out clearly about the dangers of scapegoating Arabs and Muslims. No one demanded that those statements not be issued unless they went from the particular to the general or included Jewish students, despite the fact anti-Semitic material blaming Jews and Israel for the attacks was already circulating on campus. Yet some presidents complain when a statement that goes from the particular to the universal does not specifically mention Arabs.

I have no doubt that the few presidents who would not sign will strive to create an intimidation-free environment anyway. I am concerned about what their refusal suggests. I doubt they would hesitate to speak out about anti-black bigotry without feeling a need to couple it with anti-white bigotry. Why, then, the reluctance to mention anti-Semitic death threats, uncoupled with any other form of bigotry, as a sufficient reason to articulate a commitment to maintain a campus open to ideas and closed to thuggery?

The view from here

At this writing, I am still in Washington, D.C., where every morning I read the local press, particularly the Washington Post.

Of all the various happenings in this large nation, the latest news the paper is covering has to do not with world events and the role the United States plays in them, but with a local, unknown sniper who has already killed nine people as they went about their everyday tasks.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Alas, this is the leading news in the U.S. capital. Ours is a violent world, and Washington is no exception. A killer is roaming its streets, and at this writing has not yet been caught.

Fortunately, Washington is much more than that. It is a great city with stately avenues and buildings and offers all the amenities one expects to find in most large American communities – from music and theatre to sailing and football. I had occasion to attend a splendid concert in the magnificent Kennedy Center, one of the city's landmarks.

In addition, Washington has great libraries and significant museums, remarkable shops of every kind and, for me, has become a place that has provided me with new friends.

No, I have not had dinner at the White House, nor have I met the president, but the people I have met have opened memorable vistas for me. Those who are Jewish have expressed the same kind of concern for Israel that one would find in Toronto. But somehow, in the nation's capital, their concern has special weight. U.S. policymakers are aware of Israel's significance, and, fortunately, the United States has become the Jewish State's strongest ally.

But not everyone is happy with the Mideast policy of President George W. Bush, who has lately been under extra pressure to be more vocal in his support of the Jewish State. Albert Vorspan, vice-president emeritus of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, has been in town during my time here and was said to have challenged the Bush administration's policies. He also emphasized the need for safeguarding American civil liberties, especially in an atmosphere of international tension.

The sometimes parochial nature of the Post's editorial page reminds me that the news I read is selective and not necessarily of universal significance. Happily, a recent edition of the paper did have a large article on Canada. It described Ottawa in detail and with warmth and appreciation. I was glad to see it and hope it had many readers and that further articles on Canada will follow.

Being away from Toronto gives me a chance to contemplate its many assets. It is today a world-class city of which I am very proud. A view from abroad has firmed up this sentiment.

Not wanted on the voyage

It's amazing how long a really bad idea hangs around. I refer to the paper Canada's Immigration Policy: the Need for Major Reform, by Martin Collacott, which pretends to be an objective look at our country's immigration policies and their effects on the economy and society of Canada. In reality, the paper, recently published by the Fraser Institute, is a thinly disguised rehash of things that certain groups have been saying just about forever. And what they have been saying is not pretty. In fact, Collacott seems to resurrect many of the same arguments.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

(Collacott, I should say right away, seems to have the credentials to attack our immigration policy: he has been an ambassador in Asia, he tells us, and his wife is of Vietnamese extraction. So surely he can be nothing but an objective, unbiased observer. Maybe not.)

The first things that caught my attention were two phrases referring to Canada's "ability to absorb" and "effectively integrate" immigrants. Where oh where have we heard about "absorptive capacity" – another phrase he uses – before? I'll tell you where: in the evil words of F.C. Blair, minister for exclusion of Jews before and during World War II.

Here's an example of what Collacott says: immigrants come with no skills and therefore take away the jobs of poorer Canadians, driving down wages. Or conversely, the influx of professionals like engineers pushes skilled Canadian labour into the arms of the United States, where presumably Canadian engineers flee from the immigrant hordes pressing on them for their jobs. Thus immigrants either scarf up low-paying jobs or create a brain-drain of the good Canadians.

Or consider this: our progress as a "tolerant and welcoming country will be placed at risk" if we do not bring our immigration policies in line with our "absorptive capacity." Now this figure of absorptive capacity has bedeviled the anti-immigration people for a century. Just what is this mysterious quality of population? Makes us sound like a sponge, not a country of immense space, economic possibilities and yes, tolerance. Collacott does not say – nor did the exclusionists that went before him. In the old days absorptive capacity was another way of saying white Anglos, northern Europeans, British, Scottish sometimes Baltic peoples – all desired for their thrift and hard work ethic – but never southern Europeans, blacks or Jews.

Collacott wants the government to decide how large a population we should have – a good trick, and one which I want to see him perform.

Further: immigrants may never reach the income levels of born Canadians. Maybe not – but their children do and will. Oh, and they don't speak English or French either, and their children drag down the schools. Well, if schools would restore the ESL classes they have cut from our public system, maybe more children would speak English faster! This does not occur to Collacott.

There are a lot more statements in this paper, many of them phrased in the "it may well be" manner, or figures based on non-Canadian models which "may" be true for us. (I may win the lottery tomorrow, but it is unlikely.) This kind of writing is sham academic twaddle.

Let me close with just one more example, skipping over inflammatory statements, such as our large cities may (there's that qualifier again) see race riots as the indigestible clots of immigrants cram into our schools and neighbourhoods and disrupt our nice quiet way of life.

My last example: immigrants bring disease.

Researching my master's thesis, I read for hours through the immigration files. It became addictive, and I went back to the early 1900s, transfixed by the correspondence about Jewish immigrants. As early as 1904, immigrants have brought disease. In those days, it was scarlet fever and typhoid or typhus – who wouldn't be ill after weeks on filthy ships? Now it is AIDS and TB. So don't give me your tired, poor, sick refugees. Just send me strong backs – oops, that was a former immigration minister speaking.

I'll tell you where disease, distress and difficulty linger – in the minds of people who write such papers for the Fraser Institute. They aren't even original. Let us hope they are not infecting the immigration policies of our government.

Yes, we surely need smart thinking about immigration, as it will continue to bring thousands to our country. But these sentiments demean us all. Unless Collacott, and you, the readers, are from the First Nations, we are all of us immigrants to this continent and this country. And we haven't done so badly by it, have we?

Finding a teacher

When my phone rang a couple of weeks ago, the display showed that the caller was dialing from a pay phone. I never get calls at my office from a pay phone, so I figured it was a wrong number—someone thinking I was either a taxi service or a pizza company.

My indifference vanished quickly, though, and was replaced by sharp focus and a flood of nostalgia.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

The caller was Rabbi Itzchak Marmorstein, my high school Jewish law teacher. "Izzy," as his students fondly referred to him, left Winnipeg for Israel about 20 years ago. He later assumed a pulpit in Vancouver for a few years and now lives on British Columbia's Saltspring Island. He conducts workshops, retreats and the like, and immerses himself in the study of Torah and Kabbalah.

In the two decades since leaving Winnipeg, Izzy has studied and taught extensively and now has more rabbinical ordinations than I have suits.

Izzy was passing through Winnipeg in September and was calling to invite me to an evening of study at the home of a local rabbi. The topic was "Rav Kook on War and Peace." Rav Avraham Yitzchak Kook (1865-1935) was Israel's first chief rabbi. Izzy quoted from his "Kook Book" often in the early 1980s. I couldn't refuse the invitation.

Izzy was one of those teachers who had the ability to get into your brain—left side and right side—with just a few simple words. He delivered content in context with good humour, challenging discussions and a relaxed sense of purpose.

He was one of several gifted Judaic studies teachers at Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in the early '80s. It was an exciting time to be a student. His short phone call brought me vividly back to my Judaic studies classes with some remarkable educators.

I attended Rabbi Marmorstein's evening lesson. It was a small gathering, about 20 people. He recited some of Rav Kook's poetry, read from the tattered pages of his dog-eared "Kook Book," strummed on his guitar and led the group in song.

People drank it up. It was a warm, thought-provoking and spiritual experience. It was the kind of program where you leave feeling refreshed and happy.

On the way home, I realized that I'd been craving this sort of depth and colour in Jewish learning. Izzy's visit made me realize that, while I have engaged in some Jewish learning in the past 20 years, I haven't really challenged myself since high school. (I can make the same observation about math, but for some reason, it doesn't bother me as much.)

Pirkei Avot instructs us to "aseh l'cha rav" – find yourself a teacher. In high school, finding a teacher is no great feat. They're thrust upon you. But fast forward two decades and the challenge is somewhat greater.

For me, for now, I guess I'll answer the wake-up call that Izzy's visit brought by doing more Jewish reading. I'm about a quarter of the way through The Sacred Chain, a Jewish history book by Norman Cantor. Next up, I plan to read The Lonely Man of Faith by the late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, a book I discovered on my wife's shelf last week. I also plan to occasionally read Izzy's daily "Mila Yomit" e-mail, which explores the Torah one word at a time, one day at a time.

I also plan to pay more attention to Jewish programs coming through town and make a point of attending a few more of them. And once in a while when I surf the Internet, I'll look for exciting Jewish content.

Izzy Marmorstein's visit was a treat. Learning with him was a great way to spend an evening, and the high school flashback was a gift. But, just like in high school, I now have a bit of homework to do after class.

Muslim rage and impotence in modern times

For centuries, from the decline of antiquity to the dawn of modernity, Islamic civilization reigned supreme, being a paramount military and economic power and an illustrious centre of the arts and sciences. But then things changed and Muslim supremacy waned. By the 20th century, the Muslim world was largely subjugated and in a parlous state, a pale imitation of its former self. What had happened?

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Bernard Lewis, a distinguished historian of the Middle East, grapples with this conundrum in a thoughtful book, What Went Wrong? Western Impact and Middle Eastern Response, published by Oxford University Press. It should be read in conjunction with John Esposito's erudite Unholy War: Terror in the Name of Islam, released as well by Oxford University Press.

Advancing out of Arabia, the cradle of Islam, Muslim armies stormed Syria, Palestine, Egypt and North Africa in the seventh century. A century later, from their base in North Africa, Arab Muslim forces conquered Spain and Portugal and invaded France. They then seized Sicily and established a bridgehead on the Italian mainland. Christian armies eventually expelled the Muslims from Sicily and the Iberian peninsula, but in the 11th and 12th centuries, Muslim Tatars conquered Russia.

In the climax to Muslim expansionism, the Ottoman Turks captured the ancient Christian city of Constantinople, colonized the Balkans and, in the 15th century, penetrated Vienna, in the heart of Europe. At the peak of Islam's influence, only one other civilization, that of China's, could rival its achievements. Yet, as Lewis reminds us, Islam went further, creating an intercontinental, polyethnic and multiracial empire. China, by contrast, was confined to one region and one racial group.

The breakdown of Muslim power was a gradual process, rooted in intellectual neglect and military defeats. Lewis cites a litany of factors.

The immensely important translation movement that had brought Greek, Persian and Syrian works to Muslims came to an end. The new scientific literature of Europe was almost totally unknown to Muslims, and until the late 18th century, only one medical text was translated into a Middle Eastern language, a treatise on syphilis. "Apart from that," Lewis pointedly writes, "the Renaissance, the Reformation [and] the technological revolution passed virtually unnoticed in the lands of Islam."

Muslims, he explains, considered the inhabitants of the infidel West as barbarians who had little to teach them. It was a dangerous, dated concept. Though generally contemptuous of infidels, Muslims did not dismiss them altogether, being aware of Western skills in weaponry and warfare. Due to Christianity's initial success during the Crusades, Muslim domains eventually employed Western mercenaries and experts and bought war materiel from the West.

Since there was also a recognition that Western languages could be of use, the practice arose of sending students to study in the West. This, says Lewis, was a remarkable development, given the general reluctance of Muslims to venture into Christian Europe.

Prior to these developments, Muslim lands had welcomed Christian converts to Islam and Jews. In the late 15th and early 16th centuries, Jewish refugees from Europe played what Lewis describes as "a minor but not unimportant" role in Ottoman society, bringing to bear European economic, technical and medical skills. Of greater importance were the Greeks, who were particularly useful as interpreters to the Ottomans. The infusion of European talent, however, could not stem the tide of Western hegemony. Russia annexed the Crimea – a Turkish Muslim redoubt – in 1783. This was a pivotal loss, marking the emergence of Russia as a major Black Sea power and posing a threat to Ottoman and Islamic entities.

Less than two decades later, a French expeditionary force, commanded by Napoleon Bonaparte, invaded, occupied and governed Egypt. Iran fared badly, too. By the 1813 Treaty of Gulistan, Iran was forced to cede territories to Russia and to renounce claims to Georgia and Dagistan. Subsequently, Armenia and Central Asia also fell under Russian suzerainty.

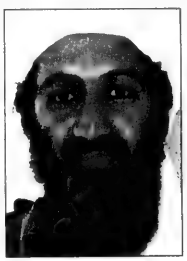
During the 1880s, Britain took control of Egypt, and in the aftermath of World War I, Syria, Palestine and Iraq were incorporated by Britain and France into League of Nations mandates.

There were, of course, Muslim modernizers, but the results they achieved were disappointing. Their quest to update their armed forces, as we have just seen, ended in humiliating setbacks. Their quest for prosperity through economic renewal resulted, in some cases, in impoverishment and corruption, and in still other cases, in an unhealthy dependence on a single resource, fossil fuels. And their quest to introduce constitutional democracy was disillusioning, ushering in an age of repressive dictatorships that continues to afflict Muslim nations to this day.

Lewis concludes: "By all the standards that matter in the modern world – economic development and job creation, literacy and educational and scientific achievement, political freedom and respect for human rights – what was once a mighty civilization had indeed fallen low."

So what went wrong? Some Arabs blamed their misfortunes on the Ottoman Turks. Still others pointed an accusing finger at Western imperialism, the United States and the oldest existing scapegoat, Jews.

Secular Arab politicians like Gamal Abdel Nasser and Hafez Assad turned to Arab nationalism as a prescription for deficiencies in the Muslim world. Since the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, Muslims have been increasingly drawn to Islamic fundamentalism, or Islamism, as a panacea for their problems, real and imagined. Lewis believes that Muslims will not improve their lot until they adopt a more self-critical approach and start asking themselves "What did we do wrong?" instead of "Who did this to us?"



Osama bin Laden

Lewis' analysis is spot on, as a recent United Nations' report confirms. The report, written by Arab intellectuals, claims that Arab societies are crippled by an isolation from the world of ideas, a lack of political freedom and the repression of women.

Islamism, the subject of Esposito's learned book, has generated an array of fundamentalist movements in Iran, Sudan, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Egypt and Malaysia.

The causes vary by country, but in his view, there are common threads: widespread feelings of failure and loss of identity in many Muslim societies; failed political systems and economies; overcrowded cities with meagre social support systems; high unemployment; the growing gap between rich and poor; the breakdown of traditional religious and social values and government corruption. Beyond all this, Israel's crushing victory in the 1967 Six Day War contributed to the perception of Arab/Muslim impotence and of the failure of the modern nation-state in the Middle East.

Esposito claims that Osama bin Laden, supposedly in hiding in Afghanistan or Pakistan since the fall of the Taliban regime last year, represents the next step in Islamic fundamentalism: jihad international. The Arab terrorists who perpetrated the events of Sept. 11, 2001 were members of that movement, and were animated by the dissolution of Muslim power. As Esposito puts it:

"European colonialism reversed a pattern of Muslim rule and expansion that had existed from the time of the Prophet. As the balance of power and leadership shifted to Europe, much of the once dominant Islamic civilization found itself either directly [ruled] or dominated by the Christian West…

"Europe's threat to Muslim identity and autonomy raised profound religious as well as political questions for many in the Muslim world: What had gone wrong? Why had Muslims fallen behind? Why had Muslim fortunes been so thoroughly reversed?"

Claiming that Muslims such bin Laden have hijacked Islam and have used its doctrine to legitimize terrorism, Esposito warns Westerners not to judge Islam by "the beliefs and actions of a radical few."

Christianity and Judaism, he argues, made their respective accommodations with modernity. Islam has so far failed in this task.

He offers an explanation, the first part of which is that Western domination of the Muslim world has been a formidable barrier to progress. "When in power, Muslim empires were open and pluralistic in engaging foreign cultures and civilizations," he adds. "When in charge of the process, there was little fear of loss of identity, faith and pride. In defeat, Muslims faced questions of identity as well as faith."

He concludes by saying that Islam, in theology and practice, has always, in the end, rejected or marginalized extremists and terrorists. This may be historically true, but how much longer must we wait until contemporary Muslims reject and marginalize such extremists and terrorists?

What is an education based on Torah values?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

"An education based on Torah values" - quoted from our Mission Statement –makes us unique. Rabbi Abraham Soffer, Educational Director, says, "We teach, but we don't preach." Every child acquires an in-depth knowledge of Jewish laws and customs, a commitment to Jewish life and a love of all things Jewish. Outside the classroom, students volunteer, participate in food drives and join the Terry Fox Run, making our community a better place to live. Says Rabbi Soffer, "The Torah value of helping others is one of the things we teach our children."

Lisa Bliss Says Hypnosis is a Sure-fire Way to Lose Weight and Look Great!

My name is Lisa Bliss. I am a registered nurse. I dropped 30 pounds in eight short months and kept it off for two years! I'd like to share my remarkable success story with you.

I thought dieting was my only way out! I tried diet pills from the health food store. I tried Weight Watchers and frozen, low-calorie foods. But I never stuck to anything long enough to have results. These "quick-fix" diets were not something I could live with long term.

Luckily, I learned about Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres through my friend and business partner. I thought it was a very different approach to weight loss, but it made a lot of sense. Not having to rely on my will power appealed to me.

Hypnosis is Different!

I love my hypnotic sessions. I am so deeply relaxed that all worries, cares or concerns seem to melt away. I can tune out the world and focus on myself for a while. And the life changes I've made while in that relaxed place are nothing short of miraculous!

I noticed a change in my behaviour my first week. I was drinking more water and didn't want to snack between meals. During those first seven days, I easily lost 4 pounds. I dropped my entire 30 lbs. without any effort whatsoever!

She should know, she melted off 30 lbs. two summers ago!

"Family and friends make comments such as, 'Wow, you have a great body!' It makes me feel like a million dollars!"

Lisa Bliss, Etobicoke

Abu Samra's speech centred on the history of the Palestinian resistance to Zionism and the State of Israel. According to Abu Samra, the prominence of martyrdom, which he interpreted as the proliferation of suicide bombers, in Sunni Islam is a relatively new phenomenon.

He said Palestinian resistance can be divided into three stages – the first stage occurred before the creation of the state of Israel, the second lasted from the mid-1960s to 1982 and the third stage began with the first intifadah at the end of the 1980s and continues until today.

Abu Samra said the first two stages were characterized by hope among Palestinians that they could change their circumstances, while in the third stage they have become "desperate."

According to Abu Samra, "the martyr or the suicide bomber as someone who represents the dominant mode of Palestinian resistance to Israeli occupation is limited to the third stage onwards."

During the question-and-answer session, audience members peppered Abu Samra, who calls himself a Palestinian citizen of Israel, with pointed questions. One audience member asked him to explain what Muslim leaders point to in the Qu'ran to justify suicide bombings.

"Don't take religion seriously," Abu Samra said. "Behaviour is determined by the social, cultural and political realities, not by texts."

He added that "martyrdom is a marginal phenomenon in Sunni Islam... I think the realities of colonialism and occupation can help to invent a new tradition."

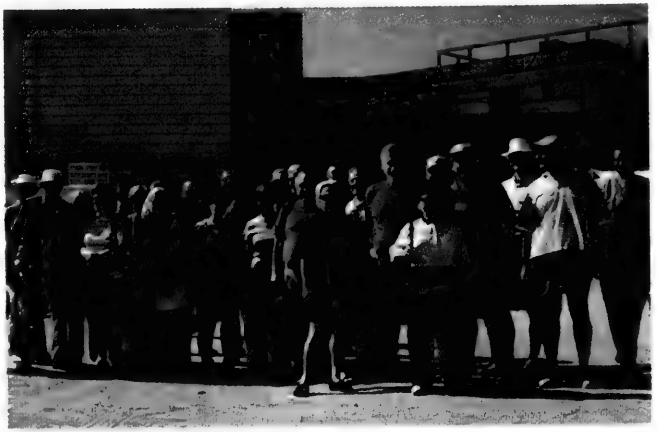
The speakers ended the evening on an optimistic note.

Adelman said a number of Arabs and Palestinians have attended lectures held by himself and Abu Samra on university campuses.

"I've sensed an interest in what we both have been saying," Adelman said. "And in our course in Israel, we have Jews and Palestinians studying together."

Abu Samra echoed Adelman's positive tone. "In the last 10 or 15 years, both sides have recognized the existence of the other," he said. "I have a feeling that both sides are aware of the fact that we have no other country. I think there's a kind of dialogue that we have noticed in recent months on both sides."

After the discussion, Kolel director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, who introduced the speakers, said in an interview that the evening helped to expose people to different sides of the issue, but the views expressed do not reflect those of Kolel, which she stressed is a pro-Israel organization.



A DOSE OF REALITY: Canadian doctors and dentists visited Laniado Hospital in Netanya as part of UJA Federation's Toronto Medical-Dental Solidarity Mission. While there, head trauma nurse Lydia Lanxer, emergency preparedness coordinator of the hospital, explained the differences in triage methods in terror emergency conditions. She illustrated the plight of the hospital by describing the Passover bombing at the Park Hotel. "There were some 300 guests; 150 were wounded on the spot – the dead I'm not counting – 73 were brought to Laniado; 22 were severely wounded. We only have 14 stretchers and we don't even have oxygen points to treat everyone. The hotel is about three minutes from here, meaning that we heard the blast. We heard the first ambulance and by the time we put our gloves on, the first victim had arrived. How do you deal with such an event?" she asked. Twenty-nine people died. A former Toronto doctor now working in the hospital, said: "To really get a feel for what Lydia is talking about, picture an ambulance team in Toronto driving a heart attack victim down University Avenue. Toronto General emergency – closed. Then you go to St. Michael's and it's closed. Mount Sinai is closed. You might have to end up in Sunnybrook. This gives you an idea of our level of preparedness. Laniado is never closed."

Henry Goodman 1907 – 1997

When Henry Goodman spoke, people took notice. That's because when Henry was passionate about something, he wanted the world to join in.

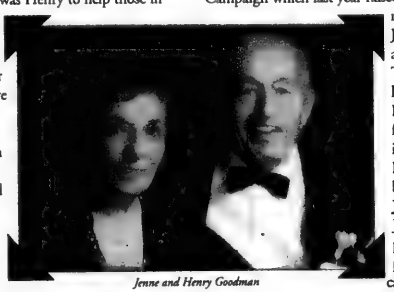
"My father always saw the glass as three-quarters full," says daughter Lesley Miller. "He was concerned about the common man and the common good and believed that if you had faith in a vision then anything was possible. He believed strongly in the whole concept of universality, what you do for this person you do for the other person. He believed in innovative programming and planning for the future. He called it as it was, he told you how he felt, and his Old World manners and charm allowed him to get away with it."

What moved Henry most were three things: family, community and social justice. Together they took him on a 60-year journey as a professional volunteer whose energy knew no bounds.

It all started in the late 1920s when young Henry, who was studying at Toronto's Osgoode Hall, found work in a law office across the street from the juvenile court. Whenever a Jewish child was in trouble, the local Jewish community would call on Henry to check up on the child and offer help. But for Henry that wasn't enough, so he took it upon himself to get cases held over until he could talk to the child's parents and work something out with the court. Henry became the legal aid representative for Jewish Big Brothers and eventually became president of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) in Toronto and co-founder of the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies (AJFCA) based in New Jersey.

"JF&CS was my first love because they take care of people from birth to death," Henry once said. "That's what being Jewish is all about."

So determined was Henry to help those in need that he didn't stop pushing until he saw change. He'd tap people for donations anywhere he could, be it on the streets, on the golf course, and on the tennis court. He even convinced the concierge at a popular country club to be his donation drop-off depot. He was a proselytizer of sorts, says daughter Rhoda Lipton, and if he believed in something "you couldn't come within an arm's reach of him without hearing about it."



Jenne and Henry Goodman

"Henry was a noodge in the best sense of the word," recalls Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS. "He would go to conferences, learn about new programs, and then be on the phone right away urging us to implement them here. He was always pushing, and as a result many new programs were initiated."

When JF&CS wanted to have a dinner in his honour Henry refused, urging potential guests to give what they could to the organization instead. The gesture evolved into an annual Friends Campaign which last year raised $300,000 for much-needed JF&CS programs and services. There's a group home named after Henry and two funds established in the name of Henry and his beloved wife Jenne – one at JF&CS so young people in their permanent care can pursue post-secondary education, and another given by AJFCA to a Jewish agency for innovative programming.

Henry's quest for social fairness benefited other organizations, too. He was very active with the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), co-founding the Fund's social planning committee and chairing it for eight years. He was also active with Toronto Jewish Congress (now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto), the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, the Jewish Community Centre, Holy Blossom Temple, Metropolitan Toronto Children's Aid Society, and Metro Toronto's Social Planning Council. Where he found the time was anyone's guess, since he also ran a busy law practice and later reinvented himself in the property investment and management business.

Henry lived to be 90 years old and was involved right to the end, always staying aware and trying to make a difference.

"Henry was concerned about the disadvantaged and the vulnerable in our community and kept reminding the rest of us of our obligations," says Mr. Wolfe. "If everybody had that kind of concern and commitment, there would be a lot more volunteers and a lot more people being helped."

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity	*If income postponed until December 15, 2003, gross equivalent yield 10.60%
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	22,830
Taxable Income	10,000	3,926
Tax (46%)	4,600	1,806	Effective improved yield on investment = 81.6%
After Tax Income	5,400	21,024
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,222	Effective improved yield on investment postponed until Dec. 15, 2003 = 112%
Spendable Income	5,400	9,802
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	9.08%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000	(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

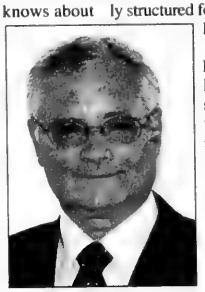
JNF shaliach is new Mr. Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Joining Jewish National Fund (JNF) as its shaliach in Toronto has been an eye-opener for Eitan Glaser.

"Before becoming involved with JNF, I knew what every other person knows about the organization – it plants trees in Israel," says Glaser, who began his three-year term in August.



Eitan Glaser

While he was on a tour of JNF projects in Israel, he says, "I suddenly noticed how much the organization really does.

"It was an education. I learned that JNF deals with land reclamation for agriculture and settlements, helps develop new water resources, restores rivers, builds roads and establishes tourism and recreation sites.

"Now that I know so much more about the organization, I am encouraged to show others what it's all about. I want to open their eyes just as mine were opened," he says.

Glaser, 57, is a graduate of the Military Boarding School of Haifa, and served as major in the tank corps of the Israel Defence Forces.

He has worked for the Prime Minister's Office, and most recently he was responsible for research publications, public affairs and communications with the Institute of Policy and Strategy of the Lauder School of Government, Politics and Strategy, an interdisciplinary centre in Herzliyah.

Since he was 14, he says, he aspired to have a military career and work for Israel. "I decided that after I retired I could still contribute to the country in other ways."

JNF Toronto had not had a shaliach for about one year because the person supposed to come just prior to the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks became involved in security matters in Boston, says Glaser.

One of the organization's more recent projects is the Halochem Park – part of Haruvit Forest – for physically challenged IDF soldiers, located between Bet Shemesh and the Re'em Junction. The park is suited for wheelchair traffic and includes a recreation area especially structured for those who are physically challenged.

This year's Negev Dinner honorees, Saul and Toby Feldberg, have chosen a second stage of the project to be funded from the proceeds of the dinner, says Glaser.

"The main idea for this park is that life goes on. Although people are suffering, they need a place where they can go and enjoy themselves. Unfortunately, more and more people are becoming disabled every day."

A JNF priority, he says, are the security roads it is currently building together with the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Agriculture and the Public Works Department, in order to ensure safe passage for IDF soldiers, and to help protect civilians who use the road daily.

Glaser's main function while in Toronto is fund-raising, he says, but he also intends to be "Mr. Israel. I plan on speaking to seniors' clubs and schools to educate people about the country and about JNF.

"When groups want someone to represent Israel, they often turn to the JNF shaliach. It is traditional for shlichim to speak about Israel, its affairs and its people."

Glaser says this is his first time in Canada. "It has been a soft landing thanks to the JNF staff. I've also found a warm community with very warm souls. I feel almost at home."

He believes strongly in Israel and in its future, he says, "but I know Israel will not be able to survive without the Jewish nation abroad. We each help each other."

NEW REENA HOME: After one year of operating from a temporary townhome, Reena officially opened a specially built home in Maple for children with autism. Allen and Judy Berg dedicated the home in memory of Allen's mother, Yetta. The Berg Home, a permanent residence for three children with autism, provides a place where these children can develop friendships, have freedom of movement, and participate in appropriate programs. A further three spaces will provide respite to 18 families on a rotational basis. The dedication ceremony included the hanging of a mezuzah by Rabbi Ahron Hoch of the Village Shul, Toronto, and greetings from Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari and Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase. Also present were representatives from the Ministry of Family and Children's Services; local councillors Susan Kadis and Linda Jackson; directors of Reena and Reena Foundation; and family and friends of the Bergs. A heartfelt thank you to the Berg Family was made by Robin and Joe Spataro, parents of a resident of the Berg Home. Seen here is (from left) Judy and Allen Berg, Robin and Joe Spataro.

Toronto artist's mural unites Israeli army base

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A portion of Rhona Stein Singer's mural.

As a volunteer on an Israeli army base this past summer, Singer was asked to paint a mural on the 60-foot exterior wall of the base – the largest base between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

"I had been working in the medical corp unit putting together medicines and instruments, and I loved the work, but after a week, I was approached about painting this mural," said Singer, a painter, art therapist and author of children's books. "I knew it was a job meant specifically for me."

She decided to volunteer in Israel with Sar-El, the National Project for Volunteers for Israel, she said, because the "country needed me. My children are grown, and my husband, Norman, supported my decision. I felt that if I didn't go to Israel, who would?"

Israel is not new to her, she says. When she lived there for three years about 30 years ago, she completed a program to become an official tour guide for the Ministry of Tourism.

"That stint plugged me into my Judaism and into the country. I was the only woman guide in Gaza, and I saw the beginnings of the mess we are in now."

When asked to do the mural, she says, "I knew I couldn't complete it myself in the five weeks I had left as a volunteer, so I recruited help. I met two other artists who were volunteering on the base and they jumped at the chance."

The theme of the wall is Sar-El Friends. The mural depicts a group of volunteers dressed in army uniform, standing with their hands on each others' shoulders.

"I developed that idea, because every morning, the soldiers would line up beside each other with their arms outstretched," she says. "By depicting the volunteers touching each others' shoulders, I was demonstrating the solidarity the volunteers feel for Israel, for the soldiers, and for each other."

The work was a bonding experience, she says. "As we painted, we developed an intense friendship. We automatically connected because we had a common dream.

"It was difficult work… We worked from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the full heat, but we discovered a 10:30 a.m. shadow that cooled things down a little."

Eventually, she said, the whole base got involved in their project.

"As the days progressed and they saw the mural taking shape, they would honk their horns and do a thumbs up. We were told that this was the first time the soldiers took such an interest in the volunteers' activities. It was uplifting to see a bond develop between them."

The soldiers had been feeling isolated and abandoned, she says, because they hadn't realized so many people cared about them. "They were overwhelmed by the commitment of the volunteers."

Those six weeks in Israel, says Singer, "reignited all my old Zionist passions. I realized I was more afraid of not going to Israel than of going there. That old pull changed me. I plan on spending four or five months there, every year."

It's a good thing she plans on going back. "There are still two empty walls on the army base," she says.

Jewish Life

There is danger in mocking warnings

By RABBI IRWIN WITTY

This week's Torah reading includes a description detailing the destruction of Sodom. Jewish tradition teaches that Sodom was the very essence of sinfulness and evil. Various sources detail how steeped the inhabitants of Sodom were in idolatry, licentiousness, lasciviousness and murder. Their cruelty and heartlessness was especially evident in their insistence that any goods or possessions held even by their own widows and orphans must be surrendered to the ruling class.

Rabbinic Reflections

Sodom's evil was entrenched in legislation, which dictated that anyone offering so much as a slice of bread to an indigent person, a stranger or a poverty-stricken neighbour would be condemned to death by fire.

Not a place any of us would want even to visit, let alone dwell therein.

Scripture informs us that despite Abraham's efforts to stave off the destruction of Sodom, the Almighty decrees that the city that was the very embodiment of evil must be destroyed.

When Abraham learns of the divine decree, he addresses his sons-in-law and urges them to flee from the doom about to be visited upon the city. He exhorts them to get themselves "out of this place." But, in the eyes of his sons-in-law, he comes across as silly; they feel the impending disaster is all a joke. So much so that Abraham himself hesitates, and as disaster strikes, he is grabbed by the emissaries from God along with his wife and daughters, and led to the outskirts of the city.

Why do Abraham's sons-in-law treat the entire prediction of doom with disdain and laughter?

The Midrash fills in what is omitted in the biblical account. Apparently, the younger men turn to him with utterly incredulity and declared, "The city is filled with joy and merriment; the atmosphere resounds with the music of harps, violins and flutes, reflecting a mood of gaiety and contentment; all of Sodom's inhabitants dwell in tranquillity; and you are declaring that the city is to be overturned? Surely, Abraham, you are a fearmonger and are using scare tactics. Things are going so well; how dare you present the gloomy scenario you are painting?"

This midrashic tale sets me thinking about a parallel reaction that many offer with regard to our contemporary Jewish world. There are those who, like Abraham of old, express grave concerns about the future of Jewish life in the West, afflicted as we are with defections due to indifference and intermarriage, widespread ignorance of Jewish sources and tenuous affiliations with Jewish institutions.

But those issuing the warnings are met with mockery. The contemporary sons-in-law of Abraham tell us that Jews enjoy freedom to an extent never known before in our history. We enjoy economic success and have reached political heights beyond the wildest expectations of the immigrant generation. Jews serve as advisors to presidents, hold judicial appointments and constitute a major force on university campuses. Jews are a significant influence in the intellectual and literary development of the West. Amidst all of this, is there a need to be concerned about future Jewish generations? How silly!

Like Abraham, we hesitate. Maybe the situation is not as bleak as we might imagine. Yet we, like Abraham, need to have someone take us away from all the glitter around us, so that Jews might recognize that, despite our incredible achievements and celebrated status, there is "gloom and doom" that dogs us and that there are dangers to Jewish life against which we must be on guard.

Rabbi Witty, director emeritus of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, is director of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library.

Israel provides access to all holy sites

MYTH:

Israel denies Muslims and Christians free access to their holy sites.

FACT:

Since 1967, hundreds of thousands of Muslims and Christians – many from Arab countries that remain in a state of war with Israel – have come to Jerusalem to see their holy places. Arab leaders are free to visit Jerusalem to pray if they wish to, just as Egyptian President Anwar Sadat did at the al-Aksa mosque.

According to Islam, the prophet Muhammed was miraculously transported from Mecca to Jerusalem, and it was from there that he made his ascent to heaven. The Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aqsa Mosque, both built in the seventh century, made definitive the identification of Jerusalem as the "Remote Place" that is mentioned in the Koran, and thus a holy place after Mecca and Medina. Muslim rights on the Temple Mount, the site of the two shrines, have not been infringed. Although it is the holiest site in Judaism, Israel has left the Temple Mount under the control of Muslim religious authorities.

For Christians, Jerusalem is the place where Jesus lived, preached, died and was resurrected. While it is the heavenly rather than the earthly Jerusalem that is emphasized by the Church, places mentioned in the New Testament as the sites of Jesus' ministry have drawn pilgrims and devoted worshippers for centuries. Among these sites are the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Garden of Gethsemane, the site of the Last Supper and the Via Dolorosa with the 14 Stations of the Cross.

The rights of the various Christian churches to custody of the Christian holy places in Jerusalem were defined in the course of the 19th century, when Jerusalem was part of the Ottoman Empire. Known as the "status quo arrangement for the Christian holy places in Jerusalem," these rights remained in force during the period of the British Mandate and are still upheld today in Israel.

Bashert & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you talk about romance and love and marriage and Judaism, one other word that inevitably comes up is "bashert." Translated as "fated," bashert is often used to mean the predestined soulmate. Today, a look at this intriguing word.

According to tradition, 40 days before a child is conceived, God has already decided one's bashert, "literally, a match made in heaven." But as the Judaism 101 site points out, just because a match is made in heaven "doesn't mean that your marriage will be trouble-free. Marriage, like everything worthwhile in life, requires dedication, effort and energy" [http://www.jewfaq.org/marriage.htm].

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin goes one step further, saying that even if your soulmate is predestined doesn't mean you don't have to get moving [http://www.ohrtorah.org.il/parsha/5758/besh.htm]. He proves that fact by quoting the Gemarah's incredible statement that bringing two people together in marriage is as difficult as the splitting of the Red Sea (Sanhedrin 22a).

Rabbi Riskin explains that God was prepared to split the Red Sea to save the Israelites, but the Israelites had to make the first move. "Comparing marriage to the splitting of the Red Sea is how the sages address the doubts and fears all couples face. The comparison tells the questioning and even fearful loving friends at the brink of a critical decision that they have to take the plunge, make the first move, be willing to work hard and to constantly move forward. Neither he nor she may sit back and wait for 'bashert.'"

It seems as if Martin Bodek has done his share of searching and has some words for encouragement for anyone who is dating. In "How to Find Your Bashert," Bodek uses some high-falootin' calculations to prove how there are billions of people in the world who are wrong for you. But don't despair, Mr. or Ms. Right is out there… if Bodek's math is right [http://www.angelfire.com/ny3/yaron2/bashert.html].

But how do know if you've found your true bashert? An article on the RealOlam site suggests that you cannot really know who your bashert is. "But once you get married, the person you married is by definition your bashert, so you should not let concerns about finding your bashert discourage you from marrying someone" [http://www.realolam.com/channels/default.asp?channel=35&articleid=1567].

For more on the subject, you can listen to Rebbitzen Rookie Billet, who analyzes some very basic questions such as, "What is a bashert?" "Why do I meet people who are unworthy of my love, yet fall in love with them?" and "Is it better to be married and miserable or single and miserable?" [http://www.613.org/subject.html#love]

To find the answers, Billet looks to the relationships of Adam and Eve and of the Matriarchs and Patriarchs. And for more on bashert, see Moshe Handler's the Meaning of Bashert [http://www.jewishinterest.com/May%20%2097%20Articles/Meaningbasherte.html].

As I mentioned above, marriages are bashert because God is the matchmaker [http://www.jewfaq.org/marriage.htm]. The Judaism 101 Web site quotes the following midrash about a Roman woman who asked a rabbi, "'If your God created the universe in six days, then what has He been doing with his time since then?'

The rabbi said that God has been arranging marriages. The Roman woman scoffed at this, saying that arranging marriages was a simple task, but the rabbi assured her that arranging marriages properly is as difficult as parting the Red Sea. To prove the rabbi wrong, the Roman woman went home and took 1,000 male slaves and 1,000 female slaves and matched them up in marriages.

"The next day, the slaves appeared before her, one with a cracked skull, another with a broken leg, another with his eye gouged out, all asking to be released from their marriages. The woman went back to the rabbi and said, 'There is no god like your God, and your Torah is true.'"

Replacing the rabbi: an inside look at shul politics

The New Rabbi: A Congregation Searches for Its Leader*, by Stephen Fried, Bantam Books, 2002, $39.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

At the centre of this compelling chronicle is Philadelphia's Conservative Har Zion Temple, which for the last 75 years has been one of America's largest and most prestigious congregations.

Rabbi Gerald Wolpe, a brilliant sermonizer and strong spiritual leader, who has served the congregation for more than 30 years, announces his decision to retire. This comes at a time when the congregation is considering a site for its new building. An exhaustive, nation-wide search for a new rabbi begins that is filled with drama, excitement and shul politics.

Stephen Fried, an award-winning investigative journalist, is granted access to the intense, often troubled personal and professional life of the temple's rabbis, and the complex, behind-the-scenes activities of a major congregation and its problems.

The search, expected to be relatively simple and to not take more than a year, extends to two years, and then to three. Numerous résumés are submitted and rejected. Well-qualified candidates are interviewed and found lacking. A rabbi chosen by the search committee changes his mind at the last moment.

The assistant rabbi at Har Zion is young, likeable and able. He becomes an unlikely candidate for the position even though, according to the rules of the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly, he is ineligible, being only three years out of rabbinical school and woefully inexperienced. A compromise is devised that allows him to serve as "senior rabbi in waiting" until the necessary six-year period is reached since his ordination.

The author, from his unusual vantage point, observes the conflicts between generations over issues of belief, observance, and the pressures of secular life. We meet Rabbi Wolpe's vigorously minded ailing wife, as well as his sons, one of whom has become a celebrity rabbi in Los Angeles.

Rabbi Wolpe had always discouraged the presence of young children at the service. For a long time, he resisted the trend of allowing children onto the bimah at the end of bar and bat mitzvahs to "lead" the closing prayer Ein Kelokeinu. One synagogue officer told Fried that he recalls Wolpe saying that such a scene is "too cute and Har Zion does not do cute."

Today, however, Har Zion does cute. "At the end of services, children from the Junior Congregation are led into the main sanctuary and up onto the bimah… The kids make noise and run around, some kids are wearing little 'dress clothes,' but most wear sneakers, baggy pants and sweaters. For some parents, this is the only reason to come to synagogue. The end of each service becomes a two-minute kiddie pageant."

In our rapidly changing affluent North American society, there are inevitable tensions between secular and traditional values. For example, 3,000 worshippers gather at Har Zion on the High Holy Days, many of them especially to hear the rabbi's well modulated and stimulating sermons. However, only a handful are present at the Sukkot festival.

If you are interested in synagogue life, changes in religious practice, the role of the congregational rabbi and what the author calls "the retail business of religion," then this book is for you. I found it of unfailing interest.

DETOUR ON THE WAY TO HEAVEN

At the end of his life, when already in poor health, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, the 19th century German Rabbi, decided to visit the Swiss Alps. His disciples, surprised the rabbi would forgo an entire day of Torah study for such an apparently unimportant pursuit, asked why he was making such a trip. He replied: "When I die I'm sure one of the first questions G-d will ask me is: 'So, Shimshon my dear rabbi, what did you think of my beautiful Alps?'
And indeed Jewish tradition teaches that G-d will ask each one of us when we arrive in heaven, "Did you make sure to enjoy the delightful world I created for you?"

Parlour meetings encourage early involvement

Longtime friends Mark Waldman and Josh Cooper are bringing a whole new generation into the UJA Federation family. For the past year and a half, Waldman and Cooper have been inviting young professionals to their homes to hear visiting Israeli speakers, raising more than $100,000 from new or existing donors. Between 25 and 110 people attended each event.

"It's a simple way for me to ease my peers into stepping up their gifts to UJA," says Waldman, 34 who is also a vice-chair of the UJA Federation Major Gifts Cabinet and co-chair of the Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund. "If we're going to ask young people to donate money, it's important for them to know what UJA is about. By coming out, they feel they're involved, that they can touch UJA a little bit. More importantly, we hope these speakers will raise the consciousness of participants about the situation faced by Jews in Israel and inspire them to become more active in the community."

Waldman says many young professionals give little to charity and don't understand what's appropriate to give. Or they're so caught up in their jobs and raising a young family they're too busy to think about giving. That's where Waldman sees his niche.

"I'm telling them they could be doing more, that they can do more. All you have to do is ask," he says.

Waldman and Cooper recently opened up their parlour meetings to non-Jews, too, so they will learn about life in Israel and take that message into the wider community. Cooper, 32, sees his "Bagels in the 905 Diaspora" breakfast sessions as nothing less than his personal way of ensuring Israel's survival.

Cooper says he got into the spirit of holding his own meetings back in May, following one of Waldman's sessions, featuring one of Ariel Sharon's top advisors, Ra'anan Gissin.

"There weren't really any educational speakers on behalf of UJA north of Steeles," says Cooper. "I attended Mark's session and saw how wonderful the potential was, and called UJA to ask who was holding these events in Thornhill. They told me nobody was, so I said, 'well then, I am'. The 905 area is Canada's fastest growing Jewish community. After seeing Gissin, I knew we had to do something in that area."

"All you have to do is ask..."

The rest, as they say, is history.

His first meeting, held in June 2002 at his Thornhill home, attracted 60 people, raising $20,000 for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. Then there was a second session featuring a prominent Israeli Defense Ministry analyst.

"A lot of people I speak to say that their parents give on behalf of the family. It is now our generation's turn to start giving, " says Cooper. "I've never been to Israel, and I have a fear that there won't be an Israel one day if people don't commit to it. I want my kids to be able to go to Israel, and I also want to go soon. That's why I do this."

Building for tomorrow

Construction has begun on the long awaited Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life near the University of Toronto, at the corner of Harbord and Huron.

The new centre – made possible by the generosity of the Wolfond family - via UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow - initiative will, hopefully be complete within a year.

The new complex will be the nerve centre of Jewish programming not only for students at U of T, but for all students in the downtown core.

It will also provide them with the tools needed to confidently take on the important task of defending Israel's cause.

The new 12,000 square foot building is long overdue to replace the existing cramped quarters at University College.

"This is a very exciting moment in the life of this project," says Zac Kaye, Executive Director of UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services. "It is the culmination of seven years of hard work on behalf of so many people, to bring us to this point."

Boasting a state-of-the-art student common room, many resource rooms, a spiritual centre, a fireplace lounge, and an outdoor garden, the Wolfond Centre will help to establish a strong connection between Jewish students and Jewish life at a time when many students are still finding themselves.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life will also provide students with the materials, information and resources to educate them about Israel and build Jewish pride on campus.

It will offer an audio-visual centre and a Cyber Centre enabling students to interactively access facts and figures for presentations to counter misinformation and propaganda.

CHAZON: a new vision for jewish education

Chazon is a new initiative of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and Jewish Toronto Tomorrow. Chazon's mandate is to bring together a group of caring, committed Jews who are passionate about Jewish education in our community. The group will identify specific concerns and needs while promoting new proactive, innovative approaches to Jewish education.

Canadian communities help to protect Israeli children

Canadian Jewish communities are responding generously to provide expanded protection for Israel's pre-school age children.

Security guards are among the allocations for funds raised during UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. The guards are designated for kindergartens, day care centres, community centres, and events in Toronto's partnership communities of Eilat/Eilot, Beit Dagan, Kfar Gvirol and Kiryat Moshe. UJA Federation will as well, fill in other gaps identified by the Jewish Agency.

"For years there was no security..."

In addition to pre-school security, UJA Federation emergency campaign funds will be allocated to help victims of terror, hospital equipment, trauma assistance and human services for Israel's most vulnerable.

Montreal's Federation/CJA has earmarked $850,000 for kindergarten security guards in the Jerusalem region. Today, thanks to this funding, guards protect 128 kindergartens in 50 complexes.

"For years there was no security and we were going to have to ask the parents to pay for guards," says Gilo kindergarten teacher Meirav Ayubi. "Now we don't." Gilo, which has suffered countless shooting attacks since the outbreak of Palestinian violence more than two years ago, is home to some 42,000 people.

More than $500,000 raised in other Canadian communities - including Vancouver, Victoria, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Windsor, London, Hamilton, Ottawa and the Atlantic region - have been transferred for security needs at kindergartens and educational facilities in the Galilee Panhandle.

Security guards such as this one at an Israeli day care centre are made possible by funds raised during UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003

Giving is growing

If UJA Federation's Ben Gurion Society is any indication, giving is growing among Toronto's young Jewish adults.

The Ben Gurion Society consists of Jews 45-years-old and under who contribute a minimum of $1,000 to the UJA Federation campaign.

This year Ben Gurion society members have raised $1.9 million so far for UJA Federation Campaign 2003, compared to $1.1 million last year – a 73% increase.

"The number of special recognition events held for Ben Gurion members, combined with Israel's situation, has made people dig deeper into their pockets," says Brad Ashley, Chair of The Ben Gurion Society with Jodi Bager.

"Young people are continually stepping up to the plate and generally exceeding the minimum Ben Gurion level. I think it's safe to say that giving is definitely growing among younger Jews," adds Ashley.

"As the mother of a young family, whose children learn the basic tenets of Judaism," says Bager, "I have the responsibility of ensuring that what they learn in Hebrew school is practiced at home, especially tzedakah and tikun olam. Through the Ben Gurion Society, I have that opportunity, as we all do."

Ben Gurion society membership has increased impressively during its three years in existence. In 2001 - its inaugural year – membership stood at 393, followed by 522 the next year, and 612 this year.

Members of the Ben Gurion Society will soon be attending their second annual retreat in Chicago from October 26 to October 28 where they will hear expert speakers and volunteer at some of Chicago's Jewish agencies.

For more information about UJA Federation's Ben Gurion Society, contact Naomi Cohen at 416.631.5698 or via email at ncohen@ujafed.org

Finding your philanthropic identity

On Tuesday, October 15, The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Family Philanthropy Forum, chaired by Michael Shulman, held part one of a two-part series called Finding Your Philanthropic Identity.

Held at Toronto's Four Seasons Hotel, the evening featured a special presentation by Mark Charendoff, President, The Jewish Funders Network, in New York. Charendoff is the former Vice President of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies, where he helped to establish the birthright israel program.

Charendoff's presentation focused on strategic philanthropy, and included a case study with facilitated family group conversations.

Part Two of the program takes place on Sunday, November 3 from 9:00 a.m. to 12:00 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, Room 421. For more information, contact Maxine Bessin at 416-631-5827 or mbessin@ujafed.org

Umbrella group launched for Holocaust survivors

Seven sons and daughters of Holocaust survivors from across the United States who undertook to come up with a plan to unite descendants of Jewish Holocaust survivors under a loosely knit umbrella group, announced their success at the International Child Survivors and Second Generation Conference.

The conference, titled Sharing the Past, Celebrating Life, was sponsored by the World Federation of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust. It took place over the Columbus Day/Thanksgiving weekend, as both nations celebrate federal holidays on the same Monday.

The Federation of Descendants of Jewish Holocaust Survivors will operate as a loose federation to provide groups and individuals with resources on the issues of concern to descendants of Jewish Holocaust survivors, and will link people together via the Internet and other media.

In a letter circulated to other descendants of survivors, the Toronto group makes clear that: "We want as many descendants of Holocaust survivors as possible to have ownership of this process. Therefore, we invite you to participate by contacting us. Please let us know your specific areas of interest and expertise, whether you would like to volunteer to co-ordinate information and communications in your region or would lead or participate in committees being organized around a variety of subjects.'

Some of the resource committees are: long term health care for aging parents; political action; restitution and reparation; memoir writing; and preserving the past.

Committees will be added as people express their interests and expertise.

The planned Web site will be structured around links to regional and resource co-ordinators, individuals, groups, and Holocaust institutions.

The new federation will work in co-operation with all legitimate Holocaust survivor groups and Jewish organizations, and is looking to establish contact with descendants of Jewish Holocaust survivors around the world.

One member of the interim steering commitee is Serena Woolrich, who formed Holocaust groups in four states in the last 30 years. She is now active in Boston.

Relieved and smiling after intense planning sessions, she said, "At last we will have the resources and wherewithal to connect to each another and share our thoughts and information. We have needed this for a long time and I'm very pleased that we have committed ourselves to reaching out to one another."

Menachem Rosensaft, the founding chair of the International Network of Children of Jewish Holocaust Survivors established in 1981, said "all of us are intent on getting this new federation off the ground."

Jeanette Friedman, founder of Second Generation North Jersey in 1979, who worked with Rosensaft on the 1981 World Gathering of Holocaust Survivors in Jerusalem, stressed that each member or group that joins the umbrella remains autonomous, and will continue to speak for itself and its constituents.

"We descendants of Holocaust survivors come from every walk of life and every religious and political denomination.

"We all have different opinions, ideas and philosophies, and only one commonality binds us – what we can learn from our past and apply to the present so that we can be assured a safe and secure future as Jews and human beings on this planet."

Chief Rabbi to speak in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, Israel's Chief Ashkenazi rabbi, will be in Toronto on a one-day trip Oct. 27, when he will speak at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

In his public lecture that evening, the rabbi will discuss The Unprecedented, Unique Bond Between Christians and Jews in the Wake of Global Terrorism.

Rabbi Lau has been meeting recently with Christian leaders and discussing publicly the bond between Christians and Jews, said Francesca David, co-ordinator of the event at Shaarei Shomayim.

The event, at $18 a ticket ($20 at the door), is a fund-raiser for a new Israeli organization, A Shoulder to A Soldier, which provides support to soldiers from low-income families and soldiers who don't have family in Israel (commonly, those who immigrated at a young age without their parents).

Rabbi Lau

Rabbi Lau was elected to his present position in 1993. A child survivor of the Holocaust, he was born in Piotrokow, Poland in 1937. His last visit to Toronto was in June 2001, when he spoke at a memorial service for the victims of the Dolphinarium disco bombing in Tel Aviv.

DISCOVER ISRAEL
Crusader Castles and Fortress Fun
Once upon a time, Israel's medieval castles and ancient fortresses provided emperors, kings and knights with wall-to-wall protection against enemy armies. Today, these historic, stone structures are exciting tourist attractions surrounded by spectacular scenery and national parks.
Montfort Castle – Even today, this French Crusader stronghold, built in 1226, is accessible only by foot. But the view of northern Israel from the well-preserved, hilltop castle ruins makes the trek well worthwhile. The Montfort Castle overlooks Nahal Kziv – the Kziv stream – which flows into the Mediterranean Sea.
Masada – Best known as the final holdout for Jewish fighters against Roman oppression, Masada was actually built as a personal fortress by the Roman King Herod. Towering over the Dead Sea, atop an isolated Judean desert cliff, the remains of Masada reveal the king's comfortable living quarters, water supply, bathhouses and administrative facilities.
Belvoir – Israel's most complete Crusader fortress, Belvoir rises 500 meters above the Jordan Valley, south of the Sea of Galilee. Belvoir was once among the world's most impregnable structures, but until 1966, it was just a rubble of ruins. Today, with restoration work finished, Belvoir is a popular site for visitors.
Nimrod Fortress – At the northern end of Israel, Nimrod, with its thick walls and high towers, is perched 800 meters above sea level. A trail leads from the fortress to the beautiful Banyas Springs and a national park preserves the majesty of the area.
For additional information about Israel's castles, available missions to Israel and individual travel options, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office. Your presence in Israel will make a significant difference.
After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Russian-born cantor to perform

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Moscow-born Svetlana Portnyanskaya, a cantor in California who has appeared as a soloist throughout the world, will present a Toronto concert on October 27 at 7 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

Svetlana performs classical masterpieces, opera, and a variety of popular, ethnic and cantorial melodies.

In a telephone interview from Newport Beach, Calif. where she is the cantor at Temple Isaiah, a Conservative congregation, she said, "Most of all, I enjoy prayers I can improvise – some you can't improvise and some you can."

Although she sings in a dozen languages including, Ladino, Hebrew, Ukrainian, Yiddish, Italian and English, she says, "I like all kinds of music but the base of my repertoire is in Yiddish and Hebrew."

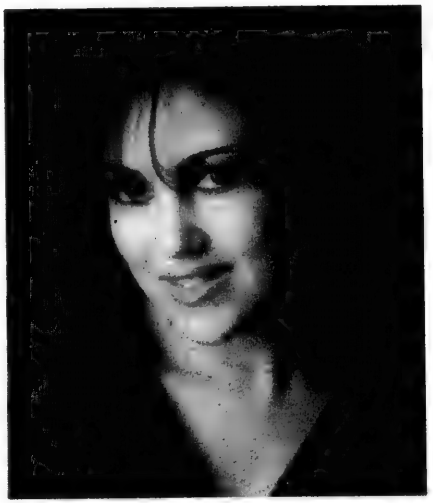
Svetlana graduated from the Moscow Conservatory of Music in 1986. She performed on radio, television and in concerts throughout the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. She won the first prize in the Soviet Union's Festival of Pop and Rock in 1990.

Shortly after, anti-Semitism raised its ugly head as she received hate mail and death threats. While performing at a concert in New York, she decided to stay in America and begin a new career.

Svetlana studied at the New York Theological Seminary. She moved to Los Angeles where she continued her studies at the University of Judaism and with the famous cantor, Samuel Fordis.

In 1996, Svetlana recorded the soundtrack for Steven Spielberg's documentary movie, Survivor of Holocaust. "This was very emotional for me," she says.

"I just signed a contract with Columbia Records which will release a CD in Hebrew. I am very happy because I will get international exposure."



Svetlana

Svetlana has performed with many world renowned performers such as, Lionel Hampton, Steve Allen, Maximillian Shell, Bruce Adler, and cantors Dudu Fisher and Yehuda Shifman.

For more information on Svetlana's concert or for tickets, call 416-226-9151 or 416-491-3014.

IF IT'S MADE IN ISRAEL MAKE IT YOURS

Israel needs your help. And one of the small ways in which you can make a big difference is by purchasing Israeli products wherever you shop.

There's a plentiful array of high quality, well priced products available, including food, wines and spirits, cosmetics, clothing, footwear, gift items, books, music and much more.

Be sure to buy Israeli during your weekly shopping or for gift items. Insist on Israeli products when you cater a simcha. And if you don't see your favorite Israeli item on the shelves, ask your store manager.

So, before you check out, check the label, and buy Israeli. Look for a list of participating merchants in our next ad.

Marathon for cancer set

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Some might think that climbing Mount Everest, the highest mountain on earth, would be the most daunting challenge one could face. But not Sean Swarner.

Swarner, 28, did manage to scale the mountain earlier this year. But before that, he had to conquer cancer, not just once, but twice.

Sheila Geist is still recovering from the death of her father. For 18 months during his struggle with cancer, he received palliative care, which, Geist said, allowed him to die with dignity, and help the family cope.

Both Swarner and Geist believe in reaching out to help those in need, and will therefore take part in the Casino Niagara Marathon, to be held in Niagara Falls on Oct. 27.

They will be raising funds for the new Harold and Shirley Lederman Palliative Care Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Swarner, from Jacksonville, Fla., was 14 when he was diagnosed with fourth stage Hodgkin's Disease, a virulent form of cancer. Although he was originally given only three months to live, chemotherapy sent him into remission. Then a second blow struck. He developed Askin's disease, an extremely rare form of cancer. Surgery, chemotherapy and radiation enabled him to survive, although he had to spend a year and a half in hospital.

When he recovered, he resumed the life of a healthy young man. He began studying for his MA in psychology, planning to counsel cancer patients. While waiting to begin a doctoral program in Chicago, he decided to try to climb Mount Everest.

He hooked up with an organization that had worked with National Geographic expeditions, and with three guides, a cook and his brother Seth, he set out for the peak. After a month and a half, he found himself looking down on the rest of the world. Swarner was the first cancer survivor to ever accomplish this feat.

"It was an overwhelming feeling," he told The CJN on a recent trip to Toronto. "When I radioed the base camp [to say that he had reached the summit], I cried like a baby. I did it for all the cancer patients around the world – they were all there with me."

The experience was life-changing, he said. "It made me realize how well the world is made and how insignificant you are, how tiny. On the other hand, [it made me realize] how important you are, and how we are here for a purpose."

Rather than finishing his doctorate, Swarner determined to work to inspire cancer patients and others in a dire situation. Through a program that includes speaking, a video and music, he hopes to motivate others to raise money in inventive ways.

Geist has already worked to help people with cancer. Last year, she managed to save the Magic Castle in Princess Margaret Hospital, an area where parents could leave their children to play safely and happily while they underwent chemotherapy, radiation or another form of treatment. This year, inspired by those who helped her father so much, she decided to raise funds to furnish the palliative care centre in a comfortable, peaceful and attractive way. Now on the 14th floor of Princess Margaret, it will eventually be housed on the 16th floor.

Together with a running team she created called Sweat Donors ("We have team shirts, shoes and caps – we want to be visual!") she hopes to raise $500,000 for the purpose. Swarner came to motivate the runners, but decided to get sponsors and run the marathon himself.

Swarner believes in living with what he calls the "five Ls – love, laughter, learning, leading by example and living life to the fullest." He said he tries to laugh a lot. "It keeps the heart open."

Geist said her father would have wanted her to get involved in such a cause.

"If you give to others, it heals your heart," she said.

Swarner isn't stopping at climbing Mount Everest, even though it is the tallest.

"I want to get sponsors to the seven summits, the highest mountains on each continent," which include, he noted, Mount Vincent in Antarctica.

Princess Margaret Hospital is a cancer research, teaching and treatment centre, part of the University Health Network that includes Toronto General and Toronto Western hospitals.

Defending Israel: Where are the other Jewish students?

By MIRIAM LEVIN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

The intention of this article is not to discuss ignorant pro-Palestinians and what Jewish students have to face today, or what a day is like at York University, but rather to address the disinterest and apathy of Jewish students on campus.

This is not addressed to those few students who come out and show support, but to the ones who stand in the hall and watch. I understand we cannot accomplish much by trying to convert the converted, but we need to challenge them and show that there are two sides to the argument.

Arguing in a fight like the one I experienced today is mostly unproductive, but it is much more effective when we have more than three people fighting 300.

Today, on my way to class, I encountered a group of students gathered in a central location on campus. As a board member of the Young Zionist Partnership, a new grassroots organization started by five students at York to educate and advocate for Israel on campus, I quickly realized from scanning the people in the group that I was seeing a Palestinian-Jewish argument.

I recognized a few of the Palestinian participants as members of the Middle Eastern Student Association, the International Socialists, the Anti-Racism Group and the Muslim Student Association. But there was a good representation from both sides, arguing about the issues in the Middle East, namely the policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and PA President Yasser Arafat, the "occupation," refugees, claims to the land, etc. There were some loud Jewish students at the beginning, but as things calmed down, the few Jewish students left the area.

Right after the 20 Jewish students left, I would estimate 200 Palestinian supporters came to join the fight. Someone started arguing with me about the Jews kicking his family out of Israel, and all of a sudden, there were 50 people around me, screaming about their relatives who died or Sharon's war crimes, or the Jenin "massacre."

After half an hour of trying to answer back, I looked at the crowd and the people behind me to see if I recognized any Jewish faces who might get involved and do something or help me defend Israel to the crowd. I saw Jewish students I knew at the end of the hall and Jewish students watching and walking by, but no one was doing anything.

The Palestinian student who was screaming at me stood two inches away and told me that if he was allowed back into "Palestine," he would volunteer to be the next suicide bomber. He asked who agreed with him, and about 100 people raised their hands. He screamed about the 15 children who died when the Israeli army blew up a terrorist's house.

I asked him why there were celebrations when my friend died in a bombing at Hebrew University, and he said he personally celebrated when he heard the news. Throughout this "conversation," about 10 different people screamed accusations about Israel at me.

I never thought that my biggest concern in university would be coming to school and finding a large pro-Palestinian rally, and Jews being afraid to do something about it. We do a great disservice to ourselves by leaving one-sided arguments unchallenged by biased axe-grinders.

My plea to my fellow Jewish students is twofold. Educate yourself, and stand up and aggressively defend Israel at every opportunity. Know the issues and stand behind the people who are arguing about them. Stop being afraid on campus to stand up and defend your country.

Palestinian students are not afraid to stand up for their cause and draw attention to themselves, and we shouldn't be either. At the end of the day, we are on the right side. There will be lots of occasions during this school year that will be similar to the one I experienced, and we need the support of our fellow Jewish students, especially in numbers. We need to stop being afraid on campus.

Miriam Levin is a second-year religious studies major at York University. She is on the boards of the Jewish Student Federation and the Young Zionist Partnership.

Project Moses to start at Montreal Hillel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Montreal Hillel is leading an international campus campaign in memory of the victims of this summer's terrorist bombing at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Launched earlier this month, Project MOSES, which stands for Masses of Students Showing Support, will raise funds across North America toward the purchase of a Torah for Hebrew University in memory of the nine who were killed and 85 who were injured in the July 31 bombing at the Mount Scopus campus cafeteria.

According to Hillel president Ariela Cotler of Montreal, thousands of students will each contribute a fixed amount for a letter of the Torah (the Torah contains 300,000 letters).

The process of writing the Torah will take about a year, she said, adding that organizers hope to have a delegation of students to deliver it personally to Hebrew Unversity for a completion and dedication ceremony with the victims' families.

Using a Torah to raise funds was the idea of a group of Montrealers attending this summer's Shusterman Conference for college students at Camp Moshava in Pennsylvania.

The idea caught on, and the campaign will be run in collaboration with Hillel International in Washington, D.C.

Montrealers taking part in the discussions included Cotler and McGill student and Project MOSES chair Kate Bush, a native of Detroit studying psychology at McGill. Bush also serves as a Hillel liaison for Jewish out-of-town students.

"We're doing this because university is supposed to be a haven, not a place of terror," Bush said in an interview, adding that the attack was against all students.

Cotler said the idea represented a "meaningful and spiritual way" to remember and pay tribute to the victims.

In total, 90 Hillel campuses, the overwhelming majority in the United States and Canada but also likely a few abroad, will take part in the drive, Bush said.

The Canadian campuses that will participate, besides those in Montreal, include several in Ontario, British Columbia and perhaps other provinces.

Yoni Petel, president of city-wide Hillel in Montreal, will also participate in the campaign, as will students at all nine Montreal university and CEGEP campuses where Hillel operates.

In memory of victims of Hebrew U bombing

At the launch, Petel described the initiative as a "meaningful, beautiful way for us to show our support for the families of the victims, to the Hebrew University community, as well as the Israeli public in general, who struggle with the daily threat of terrorism.

"We consider the Torah a tree of life, and we pray that through this gift, the memory of such special individuals, will live on," Petel said.

Bush said the campaign will probably raise much more than the $35,000 (US) needed to buy the Torah. Additional funds will be used for the Torah's adornments, and for donations to synagogues and charities, as well as toward supporting the families of victims of terror.

Bush, who visited Israel once in 1998, said she probably would have attended Hebrew University this winter were it not for the "situation."

Deciding not to go "was not an easy decision to make by any means," she said.

A press release describing the project read: "The place [terrorists] would fill with blood and chaos, hatred and destruction, we will fill with love and peace, and in the end we will win out because love is stronger than hate."

For more information about the campaign, e-mail projectmoses@hillel.ca or call 845-9171.

Opening Night

HANA'S SUITCASE

Wednesday, October 30 – 7:30 p.m.

Beth Tzedec Congregation
1700 Bathurst Street, Toronto

In March 2000, a battered empty suitcase arrived at the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre with Hana Brady, May 16, 1931 – Waisenkind (the German word for "orphan") painted on the outside. Who was Hana? What happened to her? Determined to find the answers, the Centre's curator, Fumiko Ishioka, began a relentless search across Europe that led her to Toronto and to George Brady, the surviving brother of Hana Brady.

Join us to initiate our community's internationally-recognized Holocaust Education Week and to hear this remarkable story that has attracted worldwide attention. Participating will be George Brady, Fumiko Ishioka and Karen Levine, who will introduce her award-winning CBC radio documentary based on this story. Michael Enright, well-known CBC personality, will host the program.

Baycrest Centre

The Baycrest Bulletin in Brief

Fall 2002

A message to our community

In our message to you a year ago, we told you about the many challenges and concerns we were facing at Baycrest. It was indeed a message focused on the need for change. Well, in 12 short months we have successfully made many of those changes. After careful consultation with our staff, clients, families and community, we implemented cost-reduction measures and revenue-generating initiatives with minimal impact on care. At the same time our Foundation launched a campaign to support us in maintaining our high standard of care. The community understood our need and responded with great generosity to what is now "The Annual Campaign for Baycrest".

We still face serious on-going financial pressures, but thanks to these initiatives we have definitely turned the corner. Our sights, however, have not just been on today's challenges. We have also focused on tomorrow's needs. That is why the Board and management initiated efforts to develop a clear strategic focus for our organization that will help us address the most pressing needs of the aging community – care relating to brain disorders such as Alzheimer's, Stroke and Mental Health disorders.

Baycrest has always taken pride in the care it has provided to our community and it has earned a reputation as a world-class research organization in the area of brain disorders related to aging. But our greatest strength is the ability to bring both of these together and truly change the way we care for the elderly. And through our commitment to education we will be able to share our strengths locally, nationally and internationally. That is not just our focus. It is our promise to the people we serve.

What does this mean to all of us? It means Baycrest will continue to be a strong and vital part of the community, providing the quality care most needed by our aging population. And, while our organization still has challenges, including our financial pressures, we are now better able to manage such realities.

Those of you who already receive our publication, The Baycrest Bulletin, will have seen how our care, research and education are coming together under our new focus. Here are some examples of some of the innovative initiatives we are undertaking at Baycrest. These are made possible only by your ongoing support and generosity, which contributes immeasurably to enriching the lives of the elderly.

Leadership gift from Sam and Ida Ross funds Alzheimer's research and care

Sam and Ida Ross

A leadership commitment of $5-million from Sam and Ida Ross will be used to take research to new heights in understanding the care, management and prevention of Alzheimer's disease and other major dementias.

The Ross gift will support both care and research. First, it will provide funding for basic research conducted by leading scientists in the areas of Alzheimer's and other major dementias. Second, it will allow clinicians and researchers to work in tandem at a unique interdisciplinary clinic with a focus on Alzheimer's disease. Ultimately, the clinic will improve patient access to clinicians who can assess, diagnose and care for them using the most advanced scientific findings available.

Memory and amnesia programs expand to meet need

Baycrest is expanding its Memory and Aging Program in an effort to identify and treat people with memory complaints that may put them at risk for developing a dementia.

The Memory and Aging Program was created a few years ago for healthy aging adults who wanted to understand the normal changes to memory as they age. Since then, the Psychology Department recognized that adults experiencing memory complaints more serious than normal forgetfulness also needed help. The program will work with adults identified by their family doctors as potentially high risk for developing a cognitive disorder and will offer a multi-disciplinary treatment program.

Baycrest is also expanding existing service to individuals with severe amnesia and their families. Amnesia – a permanent loss of memory – is caused by brain injuries such as stroke and encephalitis. Currently, Baycrest is the only facility in Canada to offer specialized memory retraining and family support toward restoring a degree of independence to amnestics.

Senior looks forward to weekly "big hug"

Phone volunteer Freda Slotnick

Alverine Kling gets " a big hug" once a week--at least that's what it feels like to her when a Baycrest phone volunteer calls to see how she's doing.

" I look forward to hearing Freda's voice over the phone every Tuesday," she says of volunteer Freda Slotnick. Kling is one of dozens of seniors who receive weekly calls through Baycrest's Seniors Support Program which provides a vital reassurance link to frail seniors who live alone, are on the waiting list for long-term care, or are trying to cope with caring for an ailing spouse.

Seniors are called by volunteers who are carefully selected, specially trained, multilingual, and in some cases have stayed with the program since it began. Each phone volunteer is given a group to contact on a regular basis with the hope of addressing concerns of seniors living at home. They also offer information about community resources such as Baycrest's Community Day Centre for Seniors and home care services.

Slotnick is aided in her task by volunteer coordinator Beverly Devins and social worker Lesley Patterson who makes home visits. "Phone support helps to reduce psychological distress for seniors, particualry those who are failing health or waiting anxiously for a long-term care bed," says Patterson, who is also program coordinator.

The Seniors Support Program is free-of-charge and is accepting new clients. Call (416) 785-2500 ext. 2247 for more information.

Required reading in the Economist

'According to Reports'

By PAUL MICHAELS

"No war against Iraq, Free Palestine' has become the slogan of anti-war demonstrators in Europe and America. The two conflicts have become entwined in the public mind in a way that the West's politicians cannot ignore."

So asserts the Economist, in an article that should be required reading for everybody concerned with foreign affairs in general and the Middle East in particular. "Double Standards: Iraq, Israel and the United Nations" (Oct. 10) provides a clear, careful dissection of the different categories of UN resolutions and shows precisely why no valid comparison can be made of the cases of Israel and Iraq.

As the Economist explains, when Iraq invaded Kuwait without provocation in 1990, the UN Security Council invoked the rarely used Chapter VII of the UN Charter, which deals with threats to international peace and security. It demanded that Iraq withdraw from Kuwait immediately, unconditionally and unilaterally.

By contrast, in 1967 Israel fought a war of self defence and as a result came into possession of territory. In recognition of these unique historical circumstances, the Security Council passed resolution 242 under Chapter VI, the section dealing with peaceful settlements of disputes. Resolution 242 proposed a "framework" for Arab-Israeli peacemaking that, together with Resolution 338 passed after the 1973 Yom Kippur War, obligated all the parties to take reciprocal measures: Israel's withdrawal from territories (not "the" or "all" territories) would be premised on guarantees of full peace and security.

Israel remains under no obligation to withdraw unilaterally in the absence of such guarantees. Moreover, Israel has repeatedly demonstrated, as in its peace treaty with Egypt (1979), Jordan (1994), and its Oslo agreement with the Palestinians (1993), that it will yield territory when its Arab partner is truly committed to peace. Still, there are mistakes in the Economist's analysis. Resolution 242 does not refer specifically to "Palestinian" refugees but to "refugees" in general, which could include Jews – up to 800,000 of them – who fled or were evicted from Arab countries after Israel's establishment and still have outstanding claims for compensation.

Second, the Economist notes that the claim that Israel's occupation is "illegal" is "questionable." Not so. As Abba Eban, a dovish former Israeli diplomat and expert on the UN, has pointed out, Resolution 242 in fact legitimized Israel's presence in the territories pending a negotiated solution. The Economist distinguishes between Israel's presence and particular actions it may undertake on the ground.

The Economist's treatment will not please everyone because it fails to note the historical, and even legal grounds, for Israel's claims to disputed land, even though, interestingly, it acknowledges that "Jerusalem has had a Jewish majority since the 19th century," a rare admission for the British media.

While it is not generally recognized, Israel remains a valid claimant to those territories whose status is yet to be determined. Nonetheless, the majority of Israelis have long been prepared to give up these claims (as evidenced by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's offers at Camp David) in exchange for a real, secure peace.

Therein lies the rub – the refusal of the Arab and Muslim world to allow a Jewish state to exist in its midst. Unless that intolerant attitude changes, there will, unfortunately, be no hope for a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Concordia U urged to re-invite Netanyahu

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Frederick Lowy, the rector of Concordia University, is considering a request by Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal that the university reverse its decision to cancel a speaking engagement by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

While no decision has been made to re-invite Netanyahu, "the rector will definitely consider the request," said university spokesperson Chris Mota.

Meanwhile, the school's board of governors turned down Lowy's suggestion that it begin to phase out a cooling off period instituted after violence by anti-Israeli protesters led to the cancellation of Netanyahu's Sept. 9 speaking engagement at Concordia.

Mota said Lowy had asked the board to begin lifting the cooling off period in phases, but the board "did not feel comfortable making the decision at this point."

A special board meeting could be held as early as this week to further discuss the steps taken in the wake of the Sept. 9 events, Mota said. These included a moratorium on any events related to the Middle East and a ban on information tables.

Writing from his home in Vienna, Wiesenthal urged Lowy "to reschedule Mr. Netanyahu's appearance at the university as soon as possible. Failure to do so will only further embolden those who see violence as the only way to achieve results."

Wiesenthal's letter, which is reproduced on the Internet at www.wiesenthal.com, said the level of anti-Jewish public hatred is greater than in the 1930s.

While some of that may be attributable to the intifadah, "the level of invective, the co-opting of the vocabulary of genocide to depict Israeli actions, the depiction of Israel as a Nazi-like state, the silence of the international community to state-sponsored Jew hatred in the Arab world, have all combined to create an environment of fear and in many places intimidation against Jews the world over, the majority of whom are Zionists," the letter states.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre, met with Lowy last week to present Wiesenthal's request. Re-inviting Netanyahu would send a clear signal to those who practice intimidation that their tactics will not work, Rabbi Cooper said.

"I felt the people running the school have a full grasp of the seriousness of the situation," he said. "But I'm not sure they're prepared to take the steps." Failure to do so will give the protesters the signal that their intimidation tactics are working and will likely lead to more trouble, he added.

The protesters who prevented Netanyahu from speaking "blackmailed the university and stopped freedom of expression," Rabbi Cooper said. "Why will it stop? The university must draw a red line."

He said the Concordia incident is part of a much bigger picture – of an international campaign "that was launched at Durban." Referring to last year's UN anti-racism conference in the South African city, Rabbi Cooper said "the script was written, signed off, sealed and approved at Durban."

That script, he continued, includes Israel standing in for apartheid-era South Africa as the focus of protesters' anger and vilification. The Israel divestment campaigns on university campuses parallel earlier efforts to cut off support for South Africa, he said.

The level of hate aimed at Jewish students, which includes anti-Israel protesters chanting "death to the Jews," goes "beyond just dangerous. It's an open provocation just beneath violence."

Rabbi Cooper said Concordia's efforts at reconciliation between Jewish and pro-Palestinian students are doomed to failure as long as that kind of rhetoric continues.

Noah Sarna, co-president of Hillel at Concordia, agrees. "The fact is these people led a student protest that shut down our freedom of speech and at which Jewish and non-Jewish ticketholders were hit and spat at."

He said Hillel had participated in several meetings with the Concordia Student Union (CSU) and with representatives of SPHR, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights. (Members of both groups were among the organizers of the Sept. 9 protest against Netanyahu.)

Sarna said Hillel was somewhat hesitant to continue the meetings, saying pro-Palestinians in both organizations "have taken nothing back and are unrepentant."

Despite his personal misgivings, Sarna said Hillel's executive decided late last week to continue the meetings. "We have a responsibility to pursue dialogue as a way of reducing tensions."

Meanwhile, nine people who allegedly participated in the Sept. 9 violence have been identified and will be charged, Mota said. Her best information is that one will be charged under a municipal by-law, the others under the Criminal Code. Only two are reported to be Concordia students, she added.

New synagogue dedicated in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Over 500 people gathered recently for the dedication and official opening of Winnipeg's newest synagogue.

Etz Chayim, an egalitarian synagogue with a membership of about 800 families, was formed through a merger of the three largest north Winnipeg congregations – the Rosh Pina, Bnay Abraham and Beth Israel, which together, share over 300 years of history.

The celebrations began in the morning when Torahs were carried from the former Beth Israel and Bnay Abraham buildings to their new home at the former Rosh Pina location.

Etz Chayim president Sid Kasner said the merger discussions began almost two years ago.

"The reasons are varied and diverse, the most important of which is to provide a viable and sustainable congregation in the north end of Winnipeg."

Etz Chayim's Rabbi Henry Balser descibed the new congregation as "an old/new synagogue," noting that it incorporates the histories of its constituent congregations but is a brand new entity with a clean slate.

"Dedicating Congregation Etz Chayim involves two tasks," he said.

"The first is one of memory. Our new synagogue has deep roots in Winnipeg. We stand on the shoulders of generations of Winnipeg Jews who brought sacred traditions from Europe and adapted them to the new world.

"We also must have the vision to translate those traditions and teachings so that they speak to new generations of Jews."

Other speakers included Winnipeg's senior Rabbi Peretz Weizman, who was rabbi emeritus at the Bnay Abraham and will be, as well, at Etz Chayim; Rabbi Allan Green, president of the Council of Rabbis, and spiritual leader of the Winnipeg's largest congregation Shaarey Zedek; Janet Tobin, international president of the Women's League for Conservative Judaism; Dr. Ian Goldstine, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA campaign; and official dedication chair Randy Schwartz.

Rabbi Shalom Rappaport, also rabbi emeritus of the congregation, sent greetings from Florida, where he now lives most of the year.

The festivities closed with a performance by the synagogue choir, a presentation to Jack London, who spearheaded the discusssions which lead to the merger, the procession of the Torahs – the three constituent congregations had 50 torahs between them – and a prayer led by Rabbi Balser.

RESEARCH PROJECT

University Professor seeks to speak with Jews who have been diagnosed as "infertile", or who have had or are having difficulty conceiving children, for a research project on the relationship between religion and the experience of infertility. Participation will involve an interview about your experiences, and all material will be held in the strictest of confidence. Women and men from all branches and expressions of Judaism are encouraged to take part.

'Thousands' of Argentinian immigrants expected soon

Cummings is basing his forecast on the "hundreds" of inquiries Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has received this year from Argentinian Jews beleaguered by their country's devastating economic crisis, as well as increased interest from Jews in France, and to a lesser extent Belgium, worried about the rise of anti-Semitism there.

A community delegation headed by Victor Goldbloom was in Buenos Aires for six days in early September to meet with Jews considering coming to Montreal.

FEDERATION CJA first vice-president Sylvain Abitbol is leading a similar mission to France this week.

Cummings said the Montreal community has to strike a delicate balance between coming to the assistance of Jews in distress and not robbing Israel of olim or raiding troubled communities. He said all who inquire about immigrating to Montreal are first advised to consider aliyah, but if they choose not to, then Montreal will do all it can to welcome them.

Argentinian Jewry is largely well-educated and middle-class, either professionals or small business owners, and they have been particularly hard hit by the drastic currency devaluation, soaring unemployment and rampant inflation.

"They feel they do not have a future there, particularly the young," Cummings said. About 200,000 Jews live in Argentina today. The community has seen a steady out-migration over the past 40 years, which accelerated with the anti-Semitism of the early '90s and with the economic crisis, now in its fourth year. Many have gone to Israel and Spain, and to a lesser extent, Italy.

Their interest in Montreal has been piqued by a promotional campaign the Quebec government has been conducting from its office in Buenos Aires, Goldbloom said. Montreal has historically not been the destination of large numbers of Argentinian Jews.

Montreal seems to be an attractive choice because of its strong Jewish communal life and array of institutions, particularly Jewish schools.

Goldbloom said many also think Montreal has a "European character" that they could not find elsewhere in Canada.

They wanted to know about their job prospects and whether they could practise their profession in Montreal, Goldbloom said. They also wondered about the climate and language. Many appeared to have some French, and a significant number are enrolled in French courses offered by the Alliance Française, Goldbloom said.

Quebec has a great deal of autonomy in the selection of immigrants. Health and security checks on prospective immigrants are the main areas left to Canadian authorities.

While Quebec is not fast-tracking Argentinian immigrants, Goldbloom said its Buenos Aires office is processing applications expeditiously, promising to give applicants a preliminary answer within three months.

The Jews of France will be attractive immigration candidates for Quebec because of their language and culture, Cummings said. There are between 600,000 and 700,000 Jews in France, roughly divided between Ashkenazim and Sephardim.

A daughter's tribute: The life of Elli Podolski

By JULIA KOSCHITZKY

Feature

On July 5, my mother, of blessed memory, would have turned 90. It was a milestone that our family was planning to celebrate in a big way, just as we did for each of her other special birthdays. All the beautiful tributes would have reflected on her extraordinary life, her personal trials and tribulations. But above all, the celebration would have given her immediate family, including her eight married grandchildren and 29 great-grandchildren, another opportunity to express their deep love and affection for her.

But it seems that God, in his infinite wisdom, had other plans, and we missed the celebration by four months. Instead, that time was spent sorting through her nine decades of precious possessions she had painstakingly kept. While growing up, I always marvelled at how well her delicate pieces of porcelain, crystal and silver survived through countless ocean voyages and places of residence.

Rescuing the small samplings of my mother's life, we could easily envision the world of German Jewry in the 1920s and 1930s. The books found on her shelves speak of two worlds and reveal a sense of time and place. Books by such authors as Henrik Ibsen, Miguel de Cervantes and Heinrich Heine lie alongside countless Hebrew prayer books with Gothic print inscribed with the names of family members dating back several generations.

Elli Podolski (née Moses) was born in Berlin-Charlottenburg in 1912. Her family was part of the half a million Jews who lived in Germany when Adolf Hitler came to power. An only child of Julius and Margarethe Moses, she grew up in a privileged, middle-class, modern Orthodox home surrounded by doting parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles. Her parents spared nothing in providing her with the best of everything in education, art, music and culture. At the same time, they made sure that she had a strong Jewish upbringing. When my mother spoke of her grandparents, she was always proud to mention that they owned a large matzah factory in Schonlanke.

Her well-documented and catalogued photographs of family gatherings and celebrations in Marienbad and Sunday excursions to the park Unter Den Linden or to the Berlin Zoo reveal a life that was never to return again.

Her childhood autograph book is priceless, with its rhyming prose in exquisite penmanship, accompanied by pictures she pasted on each page. The sentiments expressed on these pages do not in any way indicate a sense of urgency or impending danger. Rather, they capture the youthful hopes and dreams of friendship and love.

In 1934, she met and married my father, Max Podolski. When I look over their beautifully engraved engagement announcement, wedding menu, songsheets and telegrams that arrived from far-off places including Palestine, as well as little mementos of their honeymoon in Venice, I visualize a serene and idyllic life.

My parents belonged to the group of Jews who felt that Germany was a haven from Jewish persecution and poverty. They truly felt that the situation would improve and so they did not hasten to leave until it was almost too late. It was the terror of Kristallnacht in 1938 that finally made them realize things were as bad as they appeared. The next day, when the Gestapo called for my father, he miraculously managed to evade them by escaping out a back exit. With my mother's insistence and prodding that this was their last chance, he agreed to leave for England.

Elli Podolski

But the first available flight to England turned out to be on Shabbat. Uneasy about desecrating the holy day, my father asked the rabbi for advice. The rabbi told him that pikuach nefesh, the religious commandment to save human lives before fulfilling any other duties, took precedence in this case.

That advice proved to be very fortuitous. The next plane out after Shabbat crashed. There were no survivors.

My parents were the lucky ones, lucky that they had relatives and business connections that enabled them to get to England. The other family members were not that fortunate. Almost until the end of my mother's life, she would recall their names one by one during the Yizkor prayers, to keep their memory alive.

My parents moved from Berlin to Cardiff, in the south of Wales, where they had a relative as well as business connections. They made their home there for 10 years. Though it was very difficult, compared to what they left behind in Europe, it was paradise. It was here in this coal-mining town that my sister Jeanette and I were born.

I have few recollections of my first few years of life in Cardiff. The only memento I have is a photograph that I vividly remember getting dressed up for. It was Purim and my mother designed beautiful costumes for my sister and me made of blue and white plastic strips and huge Magen Davids that we attached to our chests. We stood together, proudly holding up the flag of our soon-to-be-formed Jewish nation.

As the political tensions of the Cold War set in, my parents became uneasy and decided to get as far away as they could from any impending conflict. So in May 1948, we sailed for Canada. We were to make that journey across the ocean twice, because my parents were daunted by the prospect of making a firm commitment to living here.

We first settled in Montreal, where the adjustments we had to make as new immigrants were difficult. A few years later, when business opportunities in Ontario became more attractive, we once again picked ourselves up and relocated to Toronto.

Just when we finally thought there was some semblance of normalcy in our lives, my father was in a car accident. He was hospitalized at Mount Sinai for 21 months. His right leg required amputation.

It was agonizing. We had no family, no medical connections and no support system to rely on. This is when our lives depended entirely on my mother. She had to keep the business afloat, bring up her two daughters and attend to my father's medical needs. In those days, she could not drive and her mode of transportation was two buses and a subway that she took everyday to bring my father homemade kosher food. Where she summoned her strength and stamina to carry on is still a mystery to me.

Throughout these turbulent years, she never lost her abiding faith in God and her commitment to Jewish values. Neither did she waver in her desire to see her daughters settle down with their perfect mates. In the end, her prayers were answered because those perfect mates also turned out to be the most wonderful sons-in-law any two parents could hope for.

Even in stressful situations, a window of opportunity presents itself. During my father's prolonged hospital stay, a romance developed between my sister and the hospital's chief resident, Benjamin Massouda. In time, they were married, and with his new son-in-law's care, my father lived for another 30 years. Together, my parents marched down the aisle at the weddings of several grandchildren and experienced the birth of their great-grandchildren.

If the beginning and ending of one's life are what really matters, my family can find true comfort in the knowledge that my mother's first quarter of a century was idyllic, as was her last. If the interim years presented her with many unforeseen challenges, she overcame them with tremendous dignity and courage.

She died on Feb. 28, a day that would have had great meaning and significance for her. It was the day of her father's birthday. She always felt extremely sad on that day as she lovingly remembered him. Now it seems that her special memories must become ours, and the sadness of that day will be compounded by her absence.

Her earthly possessions have since found their rightful place in the homes of her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, but the most precious legacy that my mother bequeathed to us is the gift of life and love that we will carry deep in our hearts.

She died in the same manner as she was born, in her own home on her pink satin pillowcase, surrounded by her loved ones – the world she had helped to create. It was a peaceful death, with barely a whimper. For this special blessing, her family will eternally be grateful.

Temple Anshe Sholom marks 150th anniversary

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — In 1853, 32 German Jewish families united to form the Hebrew Benevolent Society Anshe Sholom of Hamilton. Now a vibrant Reform congregation with a membership of close to 500 families, Temple Anshe Sholom is commemorating its 150th anniversary.

"We were the first liberal congregation in the country," Rabbi Bernard Baskin, Temple Anshe Sholom's rabbi emeritus, said in an interview.

Religious services began in 1856 in members' homes.

"For the first 10 years, this congregation had just a cemetery and a little meeting group," Rabbi Baskin said.

The congregation's first formal synagogue was a room above a leather goods shop in downtown Hamilton. Some years later, in 1882, Edmund Scheurer dedicated Temple Anshe Sholom's first building on Hughson Street, where the congregation would worship for the next 70 years.

It was Scheurer who was instrumental in bringing the ideas of liberal Judaism to Temple Anshe Sholom. He introduced English into the service, both in prayers and in sermons, which had previously been given in German. He also established Temple Anshe Sholom's religious school, the first liberal religious school in the country.

The Reform movement began more than 60 years prior to the temple's establishment, Rabbi Baskin said. "The French Revolution of 1789 broke barriers. Jews emerged out of the ghettos. It was an emancipation period."

Today, Hamilton "has the largest proportion of Reform Jews in any city in Canada," Rabbi Baskin said. "All groups [Reform, Conservative and Orthodox] get along well and work together in the interest of the community."

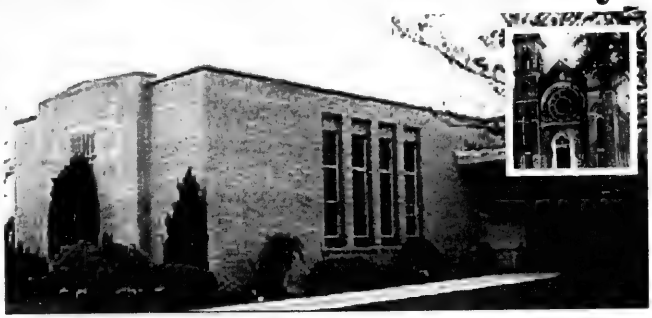
The most significant change in recent years in many Canadian Reform temples has been "a greater emphasis on ritual and traditional aspects of Judaism into the configurations of liberal Judaism," he said.

Among Temple Anshe Shalom's past spiritual leaders, Rabbi Arthur A. Feldman and Rabbi Emil Fackenheim stand out. The late Rabbi Feldman, who had a doctorate in philosophy, led the congregation through the Depression and the rise of Adolf Hitler. Rabbi Fackenheim, who later became a world-renowned philosophy professor at the University of Toronto and moved to Israel in 1984, served the congregation during the war and its aftermath. Under his tenure, the temple held its first Interfaith Institute.

The congregation's current rabbi is Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz, who has been spiritual leader for the past 14 years.

"This is a period of relative rabbinical security," Rabbi Baskin said.

Rabbi Baskin said that when he and his wife Marjorie arrived in Hamilton from the United States in 1949, he was surprised at how removed Canadian Jews were from the larger community. "Things have changed drastically in the last half century," he said. "There's a much more widely educated Jewish community here. We've come a long way."



Temple Anshe Shalom as it looks today and in early days (inset).

In 1951, Temple Anshe Sholom moved to its current location in the Westdale area of Hamilton.

Rabbi Baskin said he favoured the move, even though the land was occupied at the time by an unsightly ramshackle farmer's shack with chickens scampering about the debris-filled property. The owner was a farmer who refused to either lease or sell his property to the city. He was asking $9,500, which the building committee thought was high, although the congregation eventually decided to buy the property.

The temple is marking its 150th anniversary with a number of events. Last month, a service using the siddur and music from 1952 honoured members who have been affiliated with the temple for 50 years or more. The names of 133 people were inscribed in the temple's Golden Book. A formal gala dinner is also planned for Nov. 2. The Comedy Improv Group of Toronto will entertain. A 50-year-old time capsule from a cornerstone of the building will be opened and new items will be inserted.

Other events include: a 100-year service on Feb. 7, 2003; a renewal of marriage vows on April 6 for couples married at the temple; a 150-year service on May 2, featuring Lenny Thal, vice-president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, as keynote speaker; and a family picnic on June 1.

Lethbridge Jews recall the past, hope for the future

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

LETHBRIDGE, Alta. — The Jewish population is dwindling here, and the synagogue is struggling to remain open, as is the case in many small centres across Canada.

What remains are the strong memories of living as a Jew in the city, which now has a population of 72,700. About 35 people gathered at Lethbridge's Beth Israel Synagogue on Oct. 6 to share past experiences and see the shul before it possibly closes for good.

"Sitting in this synagogue brings back memories. The synagogue was loaded on High Holy Days. It was like a big family. Everyone took care of everyone. Everyone in this community was an auntie or an uncle to me," said Fran Snukal, one of 14 people who travelled from Calgary for the day.

Jews began moving to Lethbridge in the early 1900s, and Beth Israel was established in 1935 when the community purchased and renovated an old church. As the number of Jews grew, a new building was constructed in 1955.

At its peak, the community had about 75 Jewish families, now shrunk to 10 or 12, said longtime Lethbridge resident Hymie Davids. The congregation still gathers for High Holy Day services, but it is a struggle to hold Shabbat services.

"We have to count the women now to make up a minyan," said Davids, who helped organize the day's event with the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta.

He hopes that the synagogue will remain open and is worried that the day will come when it will be sold.

"We are going to hold onto it as long as we can. It's tough. Medicine Hat sold their building and gave their Torahs away," said the 83-year-old. "What is going to eventually happen, I don't know. I hope there will be a community here."

Garry Kohn, one of the younger members, says he received a call from a real estate agent wanting to know when the synagogue will be up for sale.

A decision to close the synagogue is up to the whole community.

Another purpose for the recent gathering was to preserve the history of Beth Israel and its community. A videographer was on hand to record the stories and the tour of the plots at the Jewish cemetery.

"We wanted to review the roots of Lethbridge. It was really good for the people who lived in Lethbridge. It was rehashing the past for them," said Emanuel Cohen, a member of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta.

Cohen also grew up in Lethbridge, but now lives in Calgary where he volunteers with the society, gathering historical archives.

"We have been silently gathering data on Lethbridge. What we are trying to do is preserve all the historical documents," Cohen said.

West Bank outpost creates political storm

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An illegal outpost in the West Bank has become the eye of a storm whose fury could be felt in the political power centers of Jerusalem.

In a tense weekend standoff, right-wing Israeli protesters clashed with police and soldiers trying to remove them from Havat Gilad – Hebrew for Gilad Farm.

The outpost near Nablus was established in memory of an Israeli killed nearby in a Palestinian terrorist attack last year.

On Sunday, the protesters burned tires, set fire to a field near Gilad Farm and blocked equipment brought in to clear the site.

By Sunday night, after six hours of confrontations, the last two standing structures at Gilad's Farm were dismantled. But later that night, protesters returned to rebuild the structures.

Sunday's clashes followed violent confrontations the previous night between some 400 protesters and police in which some 30 people were injured.

Along with confrontations at the site of the outpost, a political brawl erupted in Jerusalem over an army move that some cabinet ministers said was a blatant desecration of the Jewish Sabbath.

Right-wing ministers called Sunday for Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer's resignation because troops sent to evacuate the outpost travelled there before the end of Shabbat.

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, said the order to send the soldiers to the outpost on Shabbat was apparently a mistake, and he promised an investigation of the incident.

Amid threats by members of the National Religious Party to bolt the governing coalition, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon also denounced the army order.

But in remarks broadcast Sunday on Israel Radio, Sharon also condemned the protesters for clashing with the soldiers and police.

"Any attack against the IDF, the security forces or the police is an attack on the rule of law" and must not be allowed to take place, Sharon said.

For his part, Ben-Eliezer spoke of the protesters' actions as a "revolt" that endangered the very existence of the state.

Amid the finger-pointing over who issued the army directive to operate on Shabbat, NRP cabinet minister Efraim Eitam demanded the firing of Ben-Eliezer, who has spearheaded the campaign against the illegal outposts.

Earlier this month, Ben-Eliezer promised to have 30 of them dismantled. Of these, 20 have been taken down, an aide to Ben-Eliezer said.

Eitam attacked Ben-Eliezer for desecrating the Sabbath, calling him a liar and a coward. Eitam later apologized.

Ben-Eliezer said the protesters who fought with Israeli security forces were a group of militant youths "that even the rabbis cannot control, some of whom are quite problematic, violent types."

Right-wing leaders acknowledged they had little control over the "fringe" element and called for nonviolent resistance.

Coming after calls last week by a group of rabbis urging religious soldiers to refuse to carry out orders to clear illegal outposts, the weekend clashes raised concerns that the debate over the outposts could spill into civic unrest.

Transportation Minister Ephraim Sneh sounded an ominous note, saying the attacks on Ben-Eliezer reminded him of the political atmosphere preceding prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995 by a right-wing student opposed to Rabin's land-for-peace policies with the Palestinians.

"This blend of physical and verbal violence in an attack of this sort on the defence minister," who is also the head of the Labor Party, is "precisely the recipe for a political assassination," Ha'aretz quoted Sneh as saying.

At the end of Sunday's cabinet meeting, Ben-Eliezer complained the government was not backing up his efforts to enforce the rule of law in the West Bank and Gaza.

Commenting on the personal attacks against him, Ben-Eliezer said there is a need for drastic steps. He did not elaborate. But his remarks came against the backdrop of a simmering threat in Labor to pull out of the government over the lack of diplomatic progress with the Palestinians.

North Korea's revelations have Mideast implications

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The U.S. discovery that North Korea has successfully developed a nuclear device, despite its international commitments to non-proliferation, has ramifications for the Middle East.

Some of the country's attempts to produce enriched uranium, as well as its tests on its long-range missiles, are being conducted in Iran, in exchange for Pyongyang's helping Tehran in these two areas. Iran also agreed to conceal the efforts from the United States and from North Korea's neighbours.

Comment

Many American experts believe that North Korea received help from Pakistan in developing centrifuges for enriching uranium, in exchange for Pyongyang's aid in developing missiles – a trade of nuclear know-how for missile know-how.

Those deals were made in the early 1990s, before Pakistan's current president, Gen. Pervez Musharaf, took power. Since then, North Korea has made significant progress in developing its nuclear weapons, although its dealings with Iran are much more recent.

Pyongyang reportedly approached Iran with the intention of hiding its activity from the spying eyes of the United States and North Korea's neighbours. American, Japanese and South Korean intelligence have all been watching Pyongyang's development of nuclear and missile technology. North Korea's violation of its nuclear commitments put an end to the 1994 agreement it signed with the United States, South Korea and Japan, which promised Pyongyang modern nuclear power plants based on light water and to provide it with fuel for several years, in exchange for its ceasing operations in nuclear plants where plutonium was being produced.

The Iranians are getting help from North Korea in building centrifuges for producing enriched uranium, as well as in developing propulsion systems for long-range missiles. Foreign sources say the North Korean centrifuges in Iran have reached the operational stage for production, but they do not know when that stage was reached or how much of the processed uranium Iran will get from the North Korean centrifuges. In any case, however, the deal will certainly advance Iran's nuclear ambitions.

As for North Korea's activities in Iran regarding missiles, the foreign sources say that Pyongyang has already tested the systems for the North Korean Taepo Dong missiles. The first version of the missile was built in 1998, and a more advanced version came out less than a year later. The missile is believed to have a range of between 3,500 and 5,000 kilometres. Early testing of the missile in North Korea prompted vehement criticism by its neighbours. The Iranians have begun planning a Shihab-5 on the basis of the Taepo Dong missiles.

In addition to its involvement with Iran, North Korea has helped Syria develop a production line for improved-range Scud missiles, including advanced Scud D missiles.

Egypt also has a missile connection with North Korea. Under American pressure, Cairo was forced to forgo a deal to purchase 50 Nodong missile engines from Pyongyang. Nodong missiles have a range of 1,300 kilometres and form the basis of the Shihab-3 missile developed by Iran and the mid-range Pakistani missile.

Israel now must determine how much Pyongyang's help to Tehran has advanced Iranian ambitions, considering that efforts to block the Russian technology leak to Iran have failed. Furthermore, if Washington now applies pressure on North Korea, forcing it back into isolation, how will that affect Pyongyang's weapons development activity in other Arab countries?

There is also the question of how the new crisis with North Korea will affect Washington's plans for Iraq. With North Korea joining the nuclear club and Iran on its way, there will be severe regional implications for Asian countries such as Japan and South Korea, as well as for some Middle Eastern countries.

Talks with Hezbollah to free Tannenbaum stuck

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — This week marks two years since Hezbollah announced it had kidnapped Elhanan Tannenbaum and negotiations between Israel and the radical Lebanese organization on a prisoner exchange are stuck.

About a month after the kidnapping was announced, the French daily Le Figaro reported that Tannenbaum had been kidnapped from the United Arab Emirates.

Tannenbaum's kidnapping came shortly after Hezbollah's Oct. 7, 2000 kidnapping of three Israel Defence Forces soldiers – Adi Avitan, Omar Suwayed and Benny Avraham – in the Mount Dov area along the northern border with Lebanon. Indirect contacts between Israel and Hezbollah continue, albeit intermittently, on a prisoner exchange, but to date no meaningful progress has been made.

In early September, Israeli officials received a message from a diplomatic source in Lebanon that said Israel had an opportunity to make progress in the contacts with Hezbollah for a prisoner swap. The official estimated that Israel should quickly make a "proposal" to the Lebanese organization in order to do so.

The diplomatic official said his assessment was based on a public outcry by families of Lebanese prisoners held in Israel to Beirut and Hezbollah spiritual leader Hassan Nasrallah to take action to accelerate the return of their relatives.

But for several weeks there has been no progress in talks with Hezbollah, which are being carried out via German mediation. Officials involved in the talks said this is due to a disagreement not connected to Israel, but rather to relations between Germany and Hezbollah. A few months ago, Germany expressed its support for a call by the United States and Britain to add Hezbollah to the European Union's list of terror groups.

The security establishment in Israel, and probably Hezbollah as well, closely followed the elections in Germany held last month. The expectation was that contacts between Hezbollah and Israel would be renewed after the elections. But last week it became clear Hezbollah isn't interested in advancing the talks right now, despite new proposals made to the group in recent weeks.

This trend worries the Tannenbaum family, which recently began to support an Israeli proposal that was made to the Lebanese government a short time before the kidnappings, according to which relatives of the Lebanese held in Israel would visit them, with the mediation of the International Red Cross. Lebanon refused the proposal, claiming that any contact between Lebanese and Israelis is illegal.

"The concern now is that no negotiations are underway for a prisoner exchange," Elhanan's son, Ori Tannenbaum told Ha'aretz earlier this week. "The negotiations are stuck. Although responsibility for this falls primarily on Nasrallah, this doesn't mean that in the meantime we should sit around. We know that my father is alive, but we also know that every additional day he is held further endangers his life."

Ori Tannenbaum also said Israel should try to advance the negotiations before any U.S. attack on Iraq.

Hezbollah trying to obtain long-range missiles

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Hezbollah is trying to obtain a ground-to-ground missile with a 300-kilometre range that could hit anywhere in Israel north of Be'er Sheva, a senior Israeli source said last week in conversations with American media commentators.

Hezbollah currently has Fajr 5 missiles that can reach Haifa and the source said that the situation on the northern border "is very dangerous."

According to the senior source, the Americans brought up the scenario. Sharon discussed the Lebanon issue with CIA Director George Tenet and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell during his trip to Washington, D.C., last week.

The senior source said that if Israel is attacked from Lebanon, Israel's response would be "proportional."

He said that in case of such an attack, Israel would regard Syria as responsible. "We will not initiate an action against Syria and do not want war. If there is an escalation in the north, it is because the Syrians allow it," he said, adding that the American administration was cautioning Syria on this account.

Bush raised the Hezbollah issue in his press conference last week with Sharon, saying that the U.S. does not expect Hezbollah "to attack our friends. That would be a terrorist action and we will fight terror everywhere. We have not changed our policy toward countries that harbour terrorists."

ICC said prone to politicization

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Geography, not quality, appears to be the key criterion in the proposed appointment of judges to the International Criminal Court (ICC), an observer to a preparatory meeting of the ICC said recently.

Delegates to the Assembly of States, the parties to the ICC, agreed that judges must represent specific geographic regions of the world and must include a minimum female representation, regardless of whether judges so selected are the most qualified, said Leo Adler, director of national affairs of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Canadian office.

In a report based on his observations of a recent ICC meeting in New York, Adler said the selection process for judges – already limited by geography and gender – will be further restricted because major nations have not yet ratified the treaty establishing the court. That leaves out judicial representation from such nations as the United States, Japan, China, Russia, Israel, Mexico, Philippines and South Korea, he stated. None of these states can nominate or vote for ICC judges or prosecutors (prosecutors are not restricted by gender or place of origin).

"Asia, in particular, is grossly under-represented in the assembly, thus making it particularly difficult to choose judges from that region as representative of that continent. Finally, reality being reality, it must be recalled that the majority of nations in the world are not democracies and may not have a judiciary or a bar that is beyond the control or influence of the state, thereby raising the spectre of judges becoming instruments of the state," Adler said.

The Netherlands, Canada, Britain and Australia were the last holdouts for choosing judges without restrictions, "but in the end they were driven to this consensus in order to allow the court to proceed."

Further complicating the issue is that the proposed election procedure for judges will not be done by secret ballot. France has already nominated a judge who happens to be President Jacques Chirac's best friend. "That's what it's come down to," said Adler, a member of the criminal bar in Ontario.

Efforts by some Arab states to put Israel in the dock because of its settlement policy reflect the potential politicization of the ICC, he continued. Because the ICC is prospective – it has no jurisdiction over events prior to its existence – Arab states are "trying to get the crime of aggression defined differently in the ICC than in [the] Geneva [Convention].

"They're trying to say that the expansion of [settlements] takes land from Arabs, and this is a forced resettlement and is a crime of aggression," he stated.

That re-definition of "aggression" is not consistent with the Geneva Convention and has not made much headway at ICC meetings, Adler said. Furthermore, the Arab states' efforts are complicated by the fact that "most haven't signed on to the Rome Treaty establishing the ICC. Most of Asia hasn't signed on."

Adler was also critical of the provisions – or lack thereof – for a defence bar. The statute establishing the ICC makes financial allowances for victims' representation and for the prosecution, but not for the defence. "Unless you have status and funding, it will be difficult for people to afford it," he said.

Furthermore, the ICC, which will consist of 18 judges sitting in The Hague, is being undermined by side deals being negotiated by some of the ICC's reluctant parties, Adler said.

The United States is signing agreements with a variety of countries to shield its citizens from the operation of the court. They are agreeing not to prosecute each other's citizens. "In effect, they're opting out of the ICC," and undermining its universal jurisdiction, he said.

"This would have the effect of leaving a rump court that would only deal with those few countries that are willing to both ignore the Americans and accept the ICC without qualification."

British academic: boycott of Israel 'deplorable'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Baroness Susan Greenfield, a renowned neuroscientist and the director of the Royal Institution, has condemned a proposal to impose an academic boycott on Israel. The proposal was made by academics from Britain and Europe who were joined by some of their colleagues from Israel.

Speaking recently at an event organized by the British-Israel Chambers of Commerce, Greenfield said "The idea of an academic boycott on Israel is deplorable and reflects British academia in a very bad light because the reasons for it are wrong and groundless."

She said that a British scientific team was planning to visit Israel shortly and that she is personally working with a firm that is co-operating with an Israeli company in developing medical software.

Greenfield, a professor of pharmacology at Oxford University, is the first woman to head the Royal Institution, one of the most prestigious in Britain.

The volume of trade between the two countries stood last year at 2.6 billion pounds sterling, making Israel Britain's largest client in the Middle East.

New Israeli museum to recognize Jewish soldiers in WW II

By DAVID SAX
Special to The CJN

The Holocaust remains the defining Jewish experience of our time. It is an event of such magnitude that it unfortunately overshadows all other Jewish achievements from that period. But in our efforts to "never forget" the slaughter, we have bypassed the heroic roles that 1.5 million Jewish soldiers played in the fight against Hitler.

To highlight this neglected chapter in the history of the Jewish people, the government of Israel laid the cornerstone on The Museum of the Jewish Soldiers in World War II at an emotional ceremony on Sept. 4. Among the tanks at Latrun's Yad Lashiryon Memorial site, veterans, ministers and foreign dignitaries observed the first step toward the permanent recognition of Jews who served in Allied armies during the war.

Set up with the co-operation of the Israeli government, the Yad Vashem Museum and various veterans' organizations, the museum will educate and display the heroic achievements of Israel's sons in that great and terrible conflict. Through a mixture of artifacts and photography and multimedia exhibits, the site will honour the role played by Jewish soldiers in the war's key battles, in Resistance movements within Nazi-occupied Europe and in British-controlled Palestine.

"Together we have established a museum recognizing the fighting spirit of the Jewish people," said the memorial's chairperson, Maj. Gen. (Ret.) Chaim Erez, to a crowd made up mainly of American and Soviet veterans. "One-and-a-half million Jews fought against the Nazi beast, a quarter of a million fell as fighters, the highest percentage of any group."

Israel's deputy prime minister, Natan Sharansky, stressed the importance of remembering those achievements by recounting his childhood experiences in the former Soviet Union under Josef Stalin's rule. In an emotional speech, Sharansky detailed how his father's service in the war was denied by other veterans because he was Jewish. "In the Soviet Union, everything was done to erase any hint of Jewish heroism from World War II," he said.

The museum aims to incorporate the greater theme of Jewish strength into the site, linking it with the Latrun memorial along the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway. During the 1948 War of Independence, some of the bloodiest fighting between Israeli and Arab armies took place for control of this strategic route to Jerusalem.

In his speech, Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog, Israel's military attaché from Britain, stressed this strength. "The Jewish [fighters in WWII] gave the Zionist movement the experience it needed in the Haganah and early IDF to establish and fight for the State of Israel," he said.

Maurice Lobe sees the museum as a testament to Jewish brotherhood in combat. Lobe is one of many Diaspora Jews who fought the Nazis in Allied armies before moving to Israel to fight for its independence. Born in Northern Ontario, Lobe served with a reconnaissance unit in Iceland before moving to Israel and fighting in the War of Independence.

Col. Pat Dennis, Canada's military attaché to Israel, regards this brotherhood as a military tradition that is not unique to the Jewish experience in World War II.

"You certainly had Irish and Scottish regiments, and those people always commemorated their fallen sons," he said. "I think it's the same mentality that people celebrate the accomplishments and tragedies that befall a particular group of people... These young men went to war partly because they felt it was a worthy cause and partly because their own people were threatened."

Israeli President Moshe Katzav said the museum will become more than a testament to the past. "This site will serve as a message to the factions in the Arab world who still want to exterminate us," he said to the crowd.

The museum is expected to be completed in two years, at an approximate cost of $6 million (US).

David Sax, a Toronto writer, is currently travelling in Israel.

Thriller mixes romance, psychology and history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A series of random and seemingly unconnected events form the core of Dani Levy's tingling thriller, The Giraffe.

The 1998 film will be screened Thursday, Oct. 31 at 7:30 p.m. by the Goethe Institut (163 King St. W.) as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Taking place in the United States and Germany in the late 1990s, The Giraffe is a heady brew of history, psychology and romance, geared to appeal to an eclectic audience.

It opens as a factory owned by a Jewish businessman in Germany goes up in flames. The police suspect that neo-Nazis set the fire.

The plot thickens when a woman in New York City stumbles upon a newspaper photograph of a man she believes is her long-lost father and when a dying woman is found in a Manhattan hotel.

The tendrils of these murky incidents are linked to a web of shifting identities and tightly-kept secrets, all of which are related to Nazi Germany and the Holocaust.

Levy, who directs and stars in this intriguing movie, is quite adept at pulling together these disparate strands. But occasionally, he cannot juggle all this material successfully and the film spirals away from him.

When this happens, The Giraffe sinks into a morass and tends to be incomprehensible rather than illuminating.

The protagonists are David Fish (Levy), a New York Jew who is thrown into turmoil when his German-born mother suddenly dies, and Lena Katz (Maria Schrader), a theatre designer whose grandfather's plant is destroyed by arson.

Charles Kaminski, (David Strathearn), a private detective, rounds out the cast. He is hired to crack a major conundrum whose misty origins lie in Germany.

He gains access to a Third Reich archive in Berlin and triumphantly finds a piece of incriminating evidence that is particularly damning to one person, a Nazi war criminal who misappropriated someone else's identity after World War II.

Fish and Katz, who hail from different walks of life, meet after his mother's untimely demise. Almost immediately, they are drawn to each other, but they are really an unlikely couple.

As The Giraffe unfolds, they learn of dark secrets, of a Nazi roundup and of a frightened Jewish girl who was hidden in a basement by her best friend, a non-Jew.

At times, these startling revelations threaten to shatter their budding relationship.

Here and there, the story line becomes so complicated that one can barely follow it.

But just when you think that all is lost, Levy rescues the film with a deft move and The Giraffe redeems itself.

The Grey Zone evokes the horror of Auschwitz with amazing precision

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Harvey Keitel (right) plays a German commandant in The Grey Zone.

There have been precious few mainstream Hollywood films about the Holocaust as chilling or as realistic as Tim Blake Nelson's The Grey Zone.

Scheduled to open at the Cineplex Odeon chain Oct. 25, this compelling picture is based on the memoirs of a Hungarian Jewish doctor who assisted the infamous Josef Mengele in perpetrating gruesome medical experiments in the Auschwitz death camp.

The film, though, really turns on a doomed sonderkommando unit that perhaps redeems itself through an act of incredible courage.

Sonderkommando units, whose typical lifespan was four months, were charged with the most grisly of tasks: pacifying Jewish inmates, expropriating their valuables, herding them into gas chambers, shovelling their corpses into ovens and disposing of their remains.

In exchange for performing such unimaginably horrible duties, they were granted the right to loot, given decent food and drink and assigned reasonable quarters.

Yet they all knew they were living on borrowed time. "You're dead already here," one of its doomed members says ruefully.

The Grey Zone, whose authenticity is awesome, takes place in 1944, the year Auschwitz was shaken by an armed revolt organized by sonderkommandos.

Vastly outgunned and unavoidably reliant on peasants who could easily betray them to the Germans, the prisoners never stood a chance of succeeding.

Starring a stellar cast headed by David Arquette, Steve Buscemi and Harvey Keitel, The Grey Zone evokes the horror of a working concentration camp with amazing precision.

The crematoria, whitish smoke wafting from their chimneys, look terrifyingly real, as do the grim barracks housing the drones of the 12th Sonderkommando, consisting entirely of Hungarian Jews.

As the train with the latest victims pulls into Auschwitz one night, the camera pans on their unsuspecting eyes. If only they knew what awaited them in this hell on earth. As they disembark, they hear the soothing, civilized tones of classical music, played by an orchestra whose sole function is to lull the inmates into a state of submission.

"Cleanliness brings freedom," a sonderkommando exhorts Jews as they walk into the "showers." Then a gentle but misleading reminder: remember the hook your clothes are on. Little do they know they are on a one-way journey to oblivion.

Some inmates may know better. When a Jewish man refuses to part with his gold watch, a German guard beats him to a pulp and unceremoniously shoots him.

The worst, however, is yet to come. In scenes that are wrenching yet not exploitative, Jews let out bloodcurdling screams as Zyklon-B gas cuts them down in a pyramidal heap of bodies.

Ever ready, the sonderkommandos methodically shove corpses into burning incinerators. As the crematoria reduce them to ash and bone, we hear the clanging of eerie metallic sounds.

At the end of their shift, the sonderkommandos retire to their quarters as if nothing had happened. Deadened to the atrocities, they sit down to a meal at a table groaning with fine foods – smoked meats, oysters and cakes – and the choicest alcoholic beverages.

There appears to be no room for sadness, grief or morality in a heartless place like Auschwitz.

But when a wheezing, catatonic 14-year-old girl somehow survives a gassing, the sonderkommandos seize upon this miracle as a rare chance for personal redemption.

Urged on by a compassionate doctor who normally is at Mengele's beck and call, the sonderkommandos resolve to conceal her and thus save her from certain death.

They realize their compassion puts them at risk and possibly jeopardizes their planned rebellion. But dipping into their reserves of humanity, they throw caution to the wind.

In evoking the thunder of distant bombing raids, Nelson makes an important point: Allied aircraft bombed nearby targets but skirted Auschwitz altogether, condemning still thousands more Jews.

When the prisoners' revolt finally erupts in a fury of gunfire and confusion, the camp orchestra breaks into action yet again, and the juxtaposition between the music and the uprising is simply stunning.

Nelson's film, a cri de coeur about humanity's infinite capacity for cruelty and kindness, leaves an immense and memorable impact.

Unsentimental and powerful, The Grey Zone stands as an enduring witness to one of the darkest chapters in modern history.

Toronto Actor to Tour: Filler Up!, Deb Filler's one-woman show that she calls "a solo piece with 27 characters," closed recently in Toronto after playing for a month at the Artword Theatre. The comedy, which focuses on how a person addicted to food or other substances can find balance in her life, ran for an additional weekend before closing Oct. 20.

Theatre-goers may recall Filler's earlier show, Punch Me In The Stomach!, which played here to favourable reviews about 10 years ago. Both shows began off-Broadway in New York and both will eventually play to international audiences. Filler reports that she will perform Filler Up! in Winnipeg in December, London in February, and her native New Zealand after that. Her web site is www.filler up.ca.

Mini-Film Fest in Montreal: Congregation Dorshei Emet, the Reconstructionist Synagogue of Montreal, holds its 4th annual Film Festival on Wednesday Oct. 23, Saturday Oct. 26 and Sunday Oct.27. The event features several films directed and produced by Dorshei Emet members and others who will be present at the screenings.

Je me souviens, Eric Scott's provocative documentary about fascism and anti-Semitism in Quebec, is being shown on Saturday night. The event also features Vive le québec. . . Anglé, by director Garry Beitel and Barry Lazar, which celebrates Anglo-Quebec writers and artists such as Aislin, David Fennario, Josh Freed, Margie Gillis and Harry Mayerovitch.

Opening reception, Wednesday evening. A four-movie festival pass is $24. Single admittance is $7.50 in advance, $8 at the door. Synagogue office, 514-486-9400.

From 1935-1938 the renowned ROMAN VISHNIAC photographed Eastern Europe's shtetlekh. JUDY KOPELOW uses poignant Vishniac photographs for a special remembrance of the lives of children who vanished in the Holocaust. Over 50 photographs will be enlarged to fill the stage. Yiddish folk songs, instrumentation and narrative accompany this unique and powerful production. Followed by discussion with MARA VISHNIAC KOHN, the photographer's daughter. Moderated by CBC's EVAN SOLOMON.

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Two boys crouch beside a sewer as if it's a toy. A small hand touches the sewer, perhaps looking for a lost marble or looking for amusement in found trash. In the Polish city of Lodz in the late 1930s, these boys didn't have much to smile about – but impish grins tickle the faces streaked by dirt and poverty.

A girl who looks about eight years old is wrapped in a raggedy blanket as she holds a milk bottle. Black streaks stain her forehead. Her eyes say the words, "Don't forget."

The late Russian photographer Roman Vishniac never forgot how these lives suffered, even before the Holocaust wiped them out. His camera caught the faces and families of Jews in eastern Europe between 1935 and 1939. The photos were meant to raise funds for destitute communities in places like Warsaw in Poland and Vilna in Lithuania. But the famous photographer met indifference. Only later in life and after his death, did the world recognize the emotional force of his work.

As part of Holocaust Education Week, Toronto producer-director Judy Kopelow presents Vishniac's prewar depictions in a multi-media event on Nov. 5 at Hart House. Children of a Vanished World will commemorate the children by projecting the photos onto a 10-foot by 14-foot screen and accompanying the pictures with individual explanations. Yiddish folk music will add to the ambience at the 450-seat theatre.

"It's ... a respectful ceremony," Kopelow says, adding that the children's faces convey not only solemnity but also hope. After all, she says, these kids were so poor they could barely afford proper shoes; yet one smile here and a twinkle of the eye there, and the photo collection becomes a symbol of moving on.

With his camera, Vishniac explored this "unexplainable loss," Kopelow says, and the photos (borrowed from New York's International Center for Photography) spark questions that have no answers: Why did these children not grow up? Why could no one stop the Holocaust from swallowing these young innocents? Why us?

After the exhibition, guests can participate in a discussion with Mara Vishniac Kohn – Vishniac's 76-year-old daughter. It will be moderated by CBC's Evan Solomon. Kopelow says the discussion should "bring some insight into the evening."

Last year during Holocaust Education Week, Kopelow produced a performance of Elie Wiesel's composition Ani Maamin – a piece which literally means "I believe." It questions the suffering wrought by the Holocaust. She is also a critical-care nurse who has cared for children her whole life.

"Vishniac took these beautiful photos of children whose lives were snuffed out," she says. "It's tough to get our minds around the enormity of this cruelty and loss. But Vishniac was determined to let the world know about this."

In the years following his eastern European mission, Vishniac's efforts proved fruitless. The American public didn't want to know about the poverty overseas.

After arriving in New York in 1941, Vishniac tried to exhibit his documentary photographs because he believed the pictures of such endangered communities would prevent further catastrophes. American heads turned the other way, and Vishniac supported himself by producing well-known portraits of Albert Einstein and Marc Chagall.

Finally, in 1971, the International Center of Photography mounted the first exhibit of his work, and after his death in 1990, his daughter continued his efforts.

"My father would've been delighted to see what is happening," Vishniac Kohn said from her home in Santa Barbara, Calif. "[His collection] is a living record of how these communities survived."

Kopelow hopes people will appreciate what Vishniac went through, and how hard he worked to capture a segment of Jewish history largely ignored. Violence and desperation surrounded him, and he witnessed the first signs of tension. As he wrote in 1938 during his visit to the Jewish community in Bratislava, Hungary: "Jews were worried, but did not dare to think that the disaster was so close."

Vishniac tried to help the poor families he encountered by publicizing their plight. Kopelow is motivated by a similar need.

"I have this responsibility to help other people," she says. "And I can't be indifferent to this episode in Jewish history."

Conference aims to help those facing death

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"With an aging population, the need for end-of-life care is increasing at a galloping pace," says Patti Allen, the co-founder of a new charity that aims to help dying people and their families cope with trying circumstances.

The name of the charity, founded by Allen and her friend and business partner Marjorie Paleshi, is All Our Relations, which is presenting a three-day conference called Living Well-Dying Well: Two Sides of the Same Coin, Oct. 31 to Nov. 2 in Kitchener-Waterloo at Bingeman's Conference Centre and Wilfrid Laurier University.

The conference will feature six keynote speakers and have 30 workshops with leaders from the academic, medical, psychological, physical and spiritual worlds.

Allen says the conference is being held "so that professionals and members of the community may receive current information and understanding about living well and dying well, support and guidance for beginnings and endings, and connection with the community in the fullest sense of the word."

Allen, the wife of Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, studied under Paleshi, who is a post-graduate teacher of the Rubenfeld Synergy Method, a form of psychotherapy that integrates gentle touch and movement with verbal dialogue.

They later formed a company, Pathways to Healing Inc., that promotes ongoing educational and service programs that seek to teach and explore methods of healing and wellness.

Paleshi, a nurse and lay chaplain who is part native, lives in Elmira, Ont., and co-ordinates the holistic health program at Conestoga College in Kitchener. Allen teaches holistic healing at Seneca College in Toronto

Allen and Paleshi are spearheading a campaign to build a $2.5 million, seven-bed residential hospice and retreat centre to care for the dying and their families in Bloomingdale, Ont., near Waterloo.

"We don't like to separate life and death – they are part of the same continuum," Allen says. "Therefore, we have combined a hospice design to include space for workshops, support groups and retreats for family members.

The province does not fund residential hospices, she says. "When you come to the end, dying at home is not an option to many, and although it is available in most parts of the world and welcomed by families, there are only a few facilities here, and there are long waiting lists."

She says she hopes the government will re-examine and support the growing need for residential hospice care, as it can be provided at a much lower rate than hospital care.

"The All Our Relations' conference was planned in order to meet several needs," says Allen. "We want to familiarize people with the hospice concept, to get people to comfortably talk about death and how a brush with serious illness or death gives life more meaning. You re-order your priorities."

Marjorie Paleshi (left) and Patti Allen of All Our Relations are organizing a conference called Living Well-Dying Well: Two Sides of the Same Coin.

The conference's keynote speakers will include Dr. Robert Buckman, a medical oncologist at Toronto's Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre and TV personality; Dr. Stephen Sagar of Hamilton, a radiation oncologist who has a special interest in mind-body medicine; and Dr. Ira Byock, who has been involved in hospice and palliative care since 1978 and has served as president of the American Academy of Hospice and Palliative Medicine.

Other keynote speakers include journalist Michael Enright of CBC Radio; Ann Mortifee, one of Canada's most outstanding performing artists and a committed volunteer in the healing arts and the hospice and palliative care movement; and harpist and singer Therese Schroeder-Sheker, the founder of the palliative medical field of music–thanatology.

Musicians have been included in the conference, says Allen, "because studies find that music can reduce the amount of pain medication. Music speaks directly to our soul but also affects us physically. The conference will culminate with a concert of talented local musicians celebrating life."

For details on the conference or All Our Relations, call 1-888-383-0339 or visit www.livingwelldyingwell.org.

The ultimate Birthright success story

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

After an intense week in Israel in the summer of 2000, Daina Komlos and Richard Bloom came home with more than an attachment to their heritage.

The two Canada-Israel Experience Birthright participants recently became engaged and are planning to marry next year.

"It's the ultimate Birthright success story," Bloom said in an interview.

Growing up in Brampton, Bloom had very little exposure to a Jewish social life. Komlos is the first Jewish girl he's dated.

"I always wanted to go to Israel, but never had the opportunity," Bloom said. So The Globe and Mail's Report on Business reporter took 10 days off work and set out on a trip that he says completely changed his life.

Komlos grew up in Thornhill, attended supplementary Hebrew day schools, Jewish day camps and had been to Israel before.

After completing a B.Sc. at Western University, she applied to go on the Canada-Israel Experience trip before moving on to OISE/UT for a degree in education.

Over 10 days that July, while hiking, swimming and studying, the couple developed a relationship.

Komlos described how they "walked on the beaches, went to Arab shuks and danced in Tel Aviv nightclubs till two in the morning."

It was one of the last trips before the intifadah, so we had the freedom to roam, she said.

After the trip, Bloom went back to Toronto and Komlos stayed on in Israel for a few weeks. They corresponded by e-mail. A month after Komlos came back to Toronto, they started dating and sharing each other's lives.

Richard Bloom and Daina Komlos at the top of the Empire State Building in New York minutes after becoming engaged.

They discovered that they both have brothers named Aaron. Komlos got a chance to meet Bloom's younger brother, David, before he died of cancer in April 2001.

"David was supposed to go on the February Birthright trip to Israel, but he was too sick to go," Bloom said.

The Birthright and Canada-Israel Experience staff members were very supportive during this difficult time in their lives, he added.

Both Bloom and Komlos have since applied to be madrichim on a future Birthright trip and are hoping to go to Israel for their honeymoon next year.

In the meantime, they're remaining active in the Jewish community and planning a fall wedding.

Taekwondo's fighting chance

By DAVID OBERMAN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Taekwondo has been developing in Israel since 1977, when Michel Madar, current president of the Israel Taekwondo Federation (ITF) and member of the Israel Olympic Committee, made aliyah from France and established the first taekwondo club in Jerusalem.

Since then, Israel has developed a fair share of top athletes – many of them olim – who have represented the Jewish State at various international tournaments. But with the Athens Olympics only two years away, thoughts are now turning to qualifying for the world's biggest international event.

Preparations are under way to field a team for Athens, but Israel faces major obstacles to the dream of competing at the Olympics. The country is without an Olympic taekwondo training centre and the ITF is also facing a cash shortage that impedes its ability to send the most promising young athletes to enough European and international competitions.

Ten thousand athletes will compete in the Olympic Games, but just 125 athletes will vie for medals in taekwondo, a relatively new Olympic sport – 90 athletes competed for the first time in Sydney, 2000. The athletes will be chosen in the international selection championships, to be held in France in December 2003, and regional championships that will be held in Europe (Spain 2004), the United States, Asia and Africa. A maximum of four athletes, two men and two women, will be chosen from each country, and athletes will have to win a medal at those international or regional championships in order to qualify.

The future of Israeli taekwondo depends a lot on the ability of the ITF to prepare athletes for the Olympics.

Athens could put Israel securely on the world map of taekwondo. Madar believes Israeli success in the Olympics will also contribute to Israel's public relations campaign and, eventually, even towards establishing peace in the Middle East.

One of Madar's first important international activities after making aliyah was to make sure Israel became part of the European Federation of Taekwondo, after it was barred from competitions in Asia because of the Arab boycott. Taekwondo was the first Israeli sport to move from Asia to Europe for this reason.

Other teachers joined Madar in Jerusalem, and in its early years, the sport flourished only in Jerusalem, with clubs in such places as Rechavia (at the Gymnasia), Mevasseret Zion, and Pisgat Ze'ev.

In 1995, Michel decided to concentrate on his dream of setting up an Olympic Taekwondo Centre in Israel, with the aim of sending Israeli athletes to the Olympics. He stopped teaching and started working full-time as president of the ITF.

The recent aliyah from Russia brought many outstanding athletes to Israel, including some very talented young taekwondo specialists. These were responsible for the spread of the sport from Jerusalem to other places in Israel.

Notable among these olim from Russia are Alexei Orochov and his wife Natalia Orochov. Alexei was trainer of Russia's youth team, and now trains and manages Israel's youth team. Alexei has set up no less than eight clubs in Lod, and Natalia proved to be one of Israel's biggest successes, winning the gold medal at the Open Tournament in Holland in March 2001.

Other olim from the former Soviet Union, Boris Berezovski, Vladislav Shwarzgog and Bondo Beniashvili, have established four taekwondo clubs in Petach Tikva and three in Bat Yam, and many or most of the students are also olim.

Maxim Lerner, just 15 years old and an extremely talented athlete, captured the gold medal at the International Youth Taekwondo Championship at Toulouse in France in November 2001 and was ranked the championship's "Best Competitor."

Altogether, there are now some 6,000 students of taekwondo in Israel. More than 1,000 of them have "contestant cards" and have been registered as competitors for places on Israel's national teams.

Madar has been in contact with municipal bodies in Jerusalem and, since the establishment of the Ministry of Sport and Science, with the ministry too.

Taekwondo has been recognized in Israel as a promising sport and the ITF has received government financial support to run training sessions for the four national teams and the national championships. It has also received some funding to send teams to the World and European championships.

Israel wins Euro 2004 qualifier

VALLETTA, Malta — Israel's ordinary 2-0 win over Malta last week will be remembered only for the end result and the vital three points it yielded.

Two second-half goals, by Pini Balili (56th minute) and Haim Revivo (77th minute), were enough to clinch the result that Avraham Grant's men so desperately needed as they started their Euro 2004 qualifying campaign on a soggy and uneven pitch in Ta'Qali.

Still, based on the team's showing, Israel will only be able to dream of qualification, for their performance was a truly abysmal one, indicating it will have no chance against France and will find it difficult to get past Slovenia for second place.

Malta, beaten 3-0 by Slovenia in their opening match a month ago, appeared determined to contain the Israelis with German coach Siggi Held electing to field five defenders.

Israel attacked early, with a powerful rising shot from Balili hitting the crossbar in the 16th minute.

The Maltese created a good chance of their own in the 22nd minute, but Kaiserslautern's Michael Mifsud missed a golden opportunity when he fired over from in front of the goal.

The visitors enjoyed the lion's share of the second half, forcing the Maltese into some erratic passing and Balili finally found the net in the 56th minute, after being put through by Eyal Berkovic.

Revivo sealed the result, and after that the Israelis killed the clock.

Substitute Avi Nimni might have made it 3-0 in the last minute after being fed by Revivo, but he blasted his close-range shot over the bar with the goal at his mercy.

Israel rises to 18th in UEFA rankings

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Like a soaring free kick, Israel shot up to the 18th position in the recently published annual UEFA rankings.

The spectacular eight-place rise was the most noteworthy of all the 52 nations who are members of UEFA, European soccer's governing association, and it means Israel will have a fourth representative in European competition next season.

UEFA issued its latest coefficient ranking based on performances over the last five years.

The performance of Israel league champion Maccabi Haifa, which made history by qualifying for this year's Champions League group stage, should help in next year's ranking. Israel is expected to rise still further and could earn two places in Champions League qualifying competition.

In such a case, the league champion would start from the third qualifying round and the runner-up from the second round.

As for the three UEFA Cup participants next season, their involvement in the competition is not yet known because the entire tournament format is under review.

Marriage? Relax!

By JODI KOVITZ

As 20-somethings, we spend a lot of time trying to figure out all sorts of things. We explore our values, desires, behaviours and personalities. We discover our interests and set goals. In addition to figuring out who we are and what is important to us as individuals, we focus much of this part of our lives on building and enjoying meaningful relationships.

A relationship we hope to develop in our 20s is one with a significant other. This is a normal part of this stage of life and is not unique to being Jewish. However, what I think is more unique to our culture is the pressure we feel to either get married young or to at least be scouting out a mate with serious marriage potential while we are in our early 20s.

Where does this pressure come from? I can identify two sources. First, it is passed down from generation to generation. Our parents and grandparents want us to find nice Jewish boys and girls so that they won't have to worry about us anymore. We will build lives of our own and take care of ourselves. Even though their intentions for us are good, this attitude puts pressure on us to hurry up and get things organized. Wanting to honour our parents and be good to them, we find ourselves thinking five years in advance, overanalyzing our relationships and ourselves, and perhaps pushing ourselves to be ready for marriage when we're not.

Second, we feel pressure from our peers. It seems that there is a domino effect in groups of friends – one couple gets engaged, then another and the next. Can all these couples be ready to get married at the same time? It is wonderful in many ways – so many simchahs! But what about the last couple in the circle, the couple who are taking it easy or are at a different stage of life or simply not ready to make the commitment? They might say they don't feel the pressure, but they most certainly do.

As a result of this incredible pressure, a few things happen. People might get married before they are ready. Also, living in an environment filled with couples and marriage-talk, they might feel that there is a stigma, that there is something wrong about being alone.

But you know what? Not being in a relationship, or taking time out from being in one, can be very empowering. It can allow you to spend time focusing on and developing the most important person in your life – you. You will never be too old to find your right partner, so hopefully you will let go of that fear and open your heart to yourself and what the world has to offer you.

For those of us who are in relationships, do we have to think about marriage, children and values? Can't we just think about getting through the week and enjoying where we are in our lives? We can and we should. But it is not easy to fight the "future disease," as I like to call it.

Although it is easy on paper to suggest that we should fight our natural tendencies to plan and think about our future, I constantly struggle with this issue. But I am learning to let go of wanting to control my future and to simply bathe in my present and trust that my future will work out.

A wise friend recently reminded me that it is usually when we don't think about it at all that things work out for us and we are the happiest. So, I am trying to live by this mantra – just be, live and enjoy. Believing this to be true takes the pressure off and allows me to spend my energy being grateful for my present rather than being worried about what will happen later.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

What role does Jewish education have in combating anti-Semitism? We have all been witness to the recent ruling of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency taking steps to revoke the charitable status of the Canadian branch of Magen David Adom (MDA). We have also seen the ongoing rejection of the MDA by the International Federation of Red Cross since 1949, while the same IFRC recognized many Red Crescent societies in the Muslim world.

Is there a response to this kind of blatant anti-Semitism in Ottawa and Geneva that is adequate to the enormity of primitive hatred that nourishes it? And will it help solve the problem?

I am reminded of a lecture and protest that took place at my alma mater, Columbia University, in the early '90s. The speaker, Leonard Jeffries, was an overt anti-Semite, and the protesters outside were concerned Jews. A student named Ze'ev Maghen wrote an article called How To Fight Anti-Semitism, which caused much more stir on campus than either the speech or the protest.

Maghen argued that as evil as the speech was, the protests were even more debasing to the spirit of Judaism. I quote: "A man calls you a pig. Do you walk around with a sign explaining that, in fact, you are not a pig?... Fellow Jews, where in hell is your dignity?" His answer is that the only valid response to anti-Semitism is Jewish study and its concomitant pride. "We've spent... millions of dollars... trying to teach non-Jews what Zionism isn't. My God: when are we going to start teaching Jews what Zionism is?"

As usual, the answer is Jewish learning – for all of us, students and teachers, adults and children. And what do we do about the MDA? My father, alav hashalom, taught me a nonsense ditty:

Si and I went to the circus
Si got hit with a rolling pin
We'll get even with that circus
We'll buy tickets and we won't go in.

It's an obvious response that stems from Jewish pride and self-esteem. We donate more than we ever did – without a tax receipt!

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Quebec union urges Israel boycott

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Jewish community leaders have blasted the head of one of Quebec's largest labour federations for urging a province-wide boycott of Israeli products and accusing Israel of practising apartheid.

"A union call for a boycott of Israeli products at this time is a call for abject intolerance, blatant revisionism and terrible injustice," the leaders said in a joint statement at a press conference. "We deplore it and invite our fellow Quebecers to do the same."

They were reacting to another press conference held last week by the Centrale des syndicats du Québec (CSQ) and the Coalition for Justice and Peace in Palestine, during which CSQ president Monique Richard deplored the living conditions of the Palestinians and urged a boycott as a way to "mobilize opinion" and to get Canada to pressure Israel to end the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and find a peaceful settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The Jewish community leaders said it was "absolutely unacceptable" for Israel, which has maintained a "determined, difficult and often dangerous adherence to the highest standards of western democracy," to be compared to apartheid South Africa.

Israeli survives attack on theatre

By YOSSI MELMAN and DAVID RATNER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli woman who was freed last Saturday after Russian troops stormed the Moscow theatre that had been held by Chechen rebels for three days is recuperating in a Russian hospital.

Valeri Lisanskaya, from Nesher in the Haifa area, was the only Israeli held captive in the theatre ordeal, in which some 118 hostages are believed to have been killed.

Most of the hostages died from the effects of a mysterious gas the Russian troops used to subdue the captors in the rescue effort. Lisanskaya, 45, was hospitalized after she inhaled the gas. More than 150 hostages were reported in serious condition in hospital Sunday night.

Lisiansky was to return to Israel earlier this week, sources in the Israeli Embassy in Moscow said Sunday after speaking with her by telephone.

Political attaché Alik Milman, who, like other foreign diplomats, was not allowed by the Russian authorities to visit the injured hostages in hospital, managed to contact Lisiansky by phone Sunday morning for the first time since the rescue operation.

She told him she was recuperating and would be discharged after completing her medical treatment, but could not say what treatment she was getting because the doctors did not tell her.

In her first interview since the rescue, Lisiansky told Army Radio that the Chechen terrorists who took over the theatre did not check her identity and therefore she did not feel that her Israeli citizenship put her life at risk.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canadians Elected

TORONTO — Two Canadian women were elected to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency's board of directors for three-year terms at the news agency's annual meeting in New York earlier this month. Toronto resident Shira Herzog is executive vice-president of the Calgary-based Kahanoff Foundation and a CJN columnist and television host, and Julia Koschitzky, also of Toronto, is a longtime community activist who currently serves on the boards of many Jewish and philanthropic organizations, including the Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and The CJN. JTA now has three Canadian directors.

ISRAEL

Benefits Extended

JERUSALEM — Immigrants to Israel from prosperous countries, including the United States, will now get the same benefits as émigrés from poorer nations. The decision, made last week by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, is aimed at increasing immigration, Israel Radio reported.

Hotels Prepare for War

TEL AVIV — Hotels in outlying areas of Israel are readying for an influx of guests in the event of war with Iraq. During the 1991 Gulf War, Tel Aviv-area residents fleeing Iraqi missile attacks moved into hotels in areas considered at less risk of attack, such as Jerusalem and southern Israel. Hotels in these areas said they have received recent inquiries about down payments to secure space, Ha'aretz reported. At the same time, some Tel Aviv hotels have signed deals with foreign media outlets for rooftop broadcast rights.

Minister Blasts Rabbis

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said last week he wants to prosecute rabbis who urged soldiers not to obey orders to dismantle illegal West Bank outposts. He said such rabbis "issued similar calls seven years ago that led to the murder of [former prime minister] Yitzhak Rabin." Rabbi Zalman Melamed, head of the Rabbinical Council of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, has issued a religious edict that soldiers must disobey orders to dismantle outposts.

WORLD

U.K. Envoy Criticized

LONDON — The Simon Wiesenthal Center has called on U.K. Foreign Secretary Jack Straw to recall Britain's ambassador to Israel, Sherard Cowper-Coles, after he was quoted last week by Yediot Achronot as saying, "Israel has reduced the West Bank and Gaza Strip into a vast concentration camp." In a letter, the centre said if the comments are true, "We urge the prompt recall of Mr. Cowper-Coles for Holocaust revisionism, banalization of the memory of its victims, and endorsement of the most extreme voices of Palestinian anti-Semitism."

Peace Prize Awarded

LONDON — The Archbishop of Canterbury, head of the Church of England, awarded the Coventry Prize for Peace and Reconciliation last Wednesday to Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior; the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem Archbishop Michel Sabbag; and Sheikh Talal Sidr of the Palestinian Authority. They received the prize for their initiative in holding the Alexandria talks a few months ago to promote dialogue between the three faiths in the Mideast.

Canadian Appointed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Moishe Smith of Ottawa has been appointed B'nai Brith International's chairman of the executive, the organization's second-highest volunteer position. Smith will primarily be responsible for liaising with B'nai Brith regional presidents in the United States and for supervising the work of various international cabinets and centres. Smith is past president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Iranian Hebrew Radio

TEHRAN — Iran plans to extend the range of its Hebrew-language radio program. An official at the station told Associated Press last week that the daily half-hour program Voice of David would be expanded next week to reach not only listeners in Israel, but also in the United States, eastern Europe and Russia. The radio program began airing in June, when officials said they wanted to counter Israel's "one-sided news monopoly," the report said.

Egyptian TV to Air Anti-Semitic Series

CAIRO — Egyptian television plans to broadcast a 30-part series based on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, an infamous anti-Semitic tract.

Egyptian television began advertising Horseman Without a Horse last week, saying it will air during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which starts in early November. Israeli media and Jewish groups have criticized the show, which stars and is produced by well-known Egyptian actor Mohammed Sobhi, since plans for its production were announced last year.

The Protocols purports to reveal a Judeo-Masonic conspiracy to overthrow the established world order by fomenting wars, revolutions and capitalism that would pave the way for world Jewish domination.

In Horseman Without a Horse, Sobhi plays a character who sets out to prove that the book is historically accurate. Sobhi defended the series, telling the Associated Press his show is "an artistic work which only reveals the Zionist schemes to seize Palestine."

Chrétien assailed for Beirut performance

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has passed a motion saying it is "appalled" by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's comments during the recent meeting of Francophonie nations in Beirut.

The motion, adopted at an Oct. 20 meeting of CJC's national executive committee, came on the heels of Chrétien's speech at the summit, which he gave while oblivious to the presence of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah of the Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah, who was sitting just metres away in the front row.

CJC's national executive vice-president Jack Silverstone said the motion was made "to express serious dissatisfaction with the way the Canadian delegation handled the situation [at the summit]."

"I was flabbergasted that Jean Chrétien would be speaking in the presence of the sheik," CJC president Keith Landy told the meeting. "It boggles the mind."

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien

Landy added that the speech made by Lebanese President Émile Lahoud was "equally serious."

Lahoud opened the Francophonie summit with a tirade against Israel, accusing it of "state-sponsored terrorism." Afterward, Chrétien shook Lahoud's hand.

Later, when asked by reporters how he could shake the president's hand after that remark, Chrétien said, "It's not my opinion. But I say the violence on both sides must stop.

'Business as usual' at CMDA

MONTREAL – Despite its legal woes, it's "business as usual" for Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA), says national president Joseph Bitton.

In a statement made to reassure the organization's donors, Bitton said many people are confused about what is happening after the recent ruling by the Federal Court of Appeal that upheld the proposed revocation of CMDA's charitable status.

The organization is waiting to see if the Supreme Court of Canada will hear its appeal.

In the statement, CMDA adds: "The minister of national revenue [Elinor Caplan] can also nullify the Federal Court's decision by refusing to publish the revocation notice in the Canada Gazette," the official newspaper of the government since 1841.

But "in the meantime, ... we are still a registered charity," Bitton said. "We can receive donations and issue official tax receipts."

On July 10, 2001, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) notified CMDA that its charitable status was to be revoked because it was in violation of the Income Tax Act.

"[CCRA] alleged that ambulances donated by CMDA to Magen David Adom [MDA] in Israel were operating in Gaza, East Jerusalem [sic] and the West Bank. According to CCRA, this contravened Canadian public policy," Bitton said.

"Without providing any solid evidence, it argued also that these ambulances were not always used for medical purposes only.

"A third issue, of a technical nature, was that CMDA did not retain ownership of the ambulances sent to Israel, as required by the Income Tax Act. In support of that accusation, it mentioned the gift of an old ambulance by MDA to the Israel Defence Forces on June 14, 1999."

CMDA fought that decision in the Federal Court of Appeal. Last month, the Court ruled that operating donated ambu-

New Israeli writing

In view of the worldwide concerted effort by some in academia and other quarters to isolate Israel and Israelis, we announced last month The CJN Book Review Project, aimed at encouraging our readers to read books by Israeli authors. In the last issue of each month, therefore, this space will be dedicated to publicizing new Israeli books.

The Name, published by Riverhead Books, is Michal Govrin's first novel to be translated into English. Translated by Barbara Harshav, it is a fascinating work written by an obviously talented writer who is also a poet and an award-winning director of experimental Jewish theatre. When it first appeared in Israel in 1995, the novel received wide critical acclaim. In 1997, it won the Kugel Literary Prize. A year later, Govrin was awarded the coveted Israeli Prime Minister's Prize for Hebrew Writers.

From the editor's desk

The Name tells the story of the sad, if not tragic, character Amalia, who appears to buckle under the emotional and psychological burdens that, as a child of Holocaust survivors, she is compelled, or feels compelled, to carry.

Amalia is named after her father's first wife, a woman of great beauty, musical talent and courage who dies a horrible death at the hands of the Nazis. The conferring of her name is the seminal event in the story. We are ever conscious of its literal meaning – "Amalia" means the burden of God – as we witness her frightful struggle with its existential weight and the identity it imposes upon her. It shapes Amalia's troubled destiny.

The Name is not an easy book to read. The narrative is labrynthian in detail, told alternatingly in first and third person, a duality of voices that jump in time between past and present. The novel's key characters are sharply elucidated, each a storehouse of debilitating emotional clutter, each directly affecting Amalia's sense of self and of the world.

The setting of the story, evocatively depicted, is primarily cast in Jerusalem, but it also takes place in Tel Aviv as well as in Europe and America.

It is, however, in the elaborately architectured symbolism throughout the story that Govrin's skill is most on display. The loom on which Amalia is constantly weaving talit or parochet (Torah curtain) and to which the narrator continually refers, is merely the most obvious, but also the most complicated of the many treasure-laden symbols Govrin has spun into the text.

The novel is suffused with liturgical, scriptural and historical references that are integral to Amalia's evolving personality and to understanding the state of her mental and emotional balance.

For example, Govrin gives the charismatic, but somewhat sinister character, Rabbi Avuyah Aseraf, a name that evokes Abbaya ben Abuyah, the charismatic and also somewhat sinister sage of talmudic times. This cannot have been coincidental.

The English translation is enabling and fluid. But even so seamless a translation is ultimately inadequate in conveying the unique nuances and many-layered meanings of the original Hebrew. For example, "repentance" is an accurate translation of the Hebrew word tshuvah. But it cannot convey the core meaning of the Hebrew term, namely, returning. Yet, tshuvah, or returning – in a number of complicated and intertwined ways – is at the heart of The Name, a story that chronicles Amalia's path to the one destination where she believes she will find peace.

The Same Sea, Harvest Harcourt Books, is Amoz Oz's latest work to be translated into English. One of Israel's most celebrated writers and essayists, Oz has crafted a totally unique reading experience.

The Same Sea is a prose poem that travels the terrain of the inner psyche with deft precision and aching insight. It is all the more remarkable because of the economic and, at times even cryptic, manner of its execution.

The book could almost be described as a cinematographic novel. Free association verse flows into poetry and poetry slides back into prose. Each of the "chapters" – mini-chapters, really – is akin to a scene in a film. By novel's end, the characters are fully formed, the storyline fully realized and the insights fully explicated.

Oz has fashioned a unique, highly imaginative, multi-textured blending of characters and story centred around the people, reveries and accomplishments that comprise the life of a middle-aged, Tel Aviv area widower. He occasionally – mischievously, one might add – intersperses his own contemporary voice into the story.

The story's characters lead thoroughly secular, non-observant, and not always commendable lives. But the book is suffused with biblical and rabbinic allusions, as fits perhaps, a story written in and about modern Israel.

Next month, we will review The Crime of Writing by Haim Lapid.

Arab American journalist a strong backer of Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A community rally last week heard a no holds-barred endorsement of Israel that might have made the most diehard Israeli nationalist proud – yet the hardline message came from an unlikely source, a Christian Arab journalist.

In an address that pulled no punches, Joseph Farah discussed "the hard truth about the Middle East," exposing a number of "myths" he said lay at the heart of the present conflict. The Oslo accords, he said, were not a recipe for peace, but rather Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's "Trojan Horse;" Palestine has never been more that an unreal "never-never land;" Palestinians are indistinguishable by language, religion or culture from other Arabs in the Middle East; and Muslim claims that Jerusalem contains Islamic holy sites are bogus.

Farah's analysis of the Arab-Israeli conflict drew a standing ovation from an overflow crowd at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. The Oct. 21 rally was sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Christians for Israel (Canada) and radio host Zelda Young. Farah also spoke at a Montreal synagogue the following day.

Farah, who is the editor and CEO of WorldNetDaily.com, a U.S.-based conservative Internet news site, began by examining the "myth" that the Palestinians simply want a homeland of their own. In fact, he said, prior to Israel's seizure of the West Bank and Gaza in 1967, they took no steps to create that state. What Palestinians really want is to destroy the Jews' homeland, Farah said.

Only one year after the Oslo accords were signed, he noted, Arafat gave a speech that compared the agreement with Israel to one signed by Mohammed with the Quresh tribe, which Mohammed abrogated when circumstances suited him.

Farah, a second generation American of Lebanese and Christian descent, dismissed Arab claims that the Palestinians are the country's indigenous people. A large Arab in-migration from surrounding areas coincided with the Jews' efforts to develop the area's economy. Moreover, since the Olso agreements were signed, more than 400,000 Arabs have entered the West Bank and Gaza from Arab countries, and since 1967, Arabs have built 261 settlements, far more than the 144 attributed to Jewish settlers, he said.

Referring to a 1906 travel guide, Farah noted Jerusalem's Muslim population amounted to only 7,000 out of a (largely Jewish) population of 60,000. This, he said pointedly, in "the third holiest city in Islam."

Farah, who has been a journalist for 25 years, also took aim at a "media bias" that he said favours the Palestinian cause. The BBC, he said, refers to the IRA as terrorists but Palestinian bombers are termed "militants." Associated Press describes Ariel Sharon as "hardline," but the news agency "often calls Arafat a moderate."

Journalists no longer search for truth, but instead strive for balance and end up distorting reality, he said. In attempting to present "balancing views," Palestinian spokespeople who make outrageous assertions that have no basis in fact are presented on par with statements that describe reality. The result, he said, can be found in the New York Times balancing Arafat's assertion that no Jewish Temple stood in Jerusalem with Israel's "claim" that it did.

"Arab leaders," he continued, "are determined to fan the flames of hate with Israel," to scapegoat the Jewish state and divert their peoples' attention from their countries' own absence of human rights. Arab states "have done far less for their own people than Israel has [for Arabs in Israel]," he said.

Farah, who has received death threats for his views, concluded by describing Arafat as the inspiration for arch-terrorist Osama bin Laden and warning that Western policy must not allow itself to be held hostage by Arafat, bin Laden and the Saudis. He said the West must wean itself from Mideastern oil, pull back from the Middle East, stop telling Israel what it can and cannot do and hold the Arab states up to the same standards it applies in the rest of the world.

Farah's address was preceded by a special presentation of B'nai Brith's Award of Distinction for Excellence in Journalism to four recipients: Stewart Bell (National Post); Rosie DiManno (Toronto Star); John Downing (Toronto Sun); and Marcus Gee (Globe and Mail).

In opening remarks, Israel's consul general in Toronto, Meir Romem, urged Canadian Jews to make aliyah within the next few years. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has set a target of one million olim in the next 10 years, and he suggested 100,000 Canadian Jews should join that proposed immigration in the next five years.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman also addressed the rally, drawing on the biblical story of Abraham's liberation of the city of Shalem, Jerusalem's predecessor, and comparing it to today's situation. The Palestinian leadership, he said, "seeks not our friendship, but our destruction."

"God will not abandon his people," he said.

The Changing Role of Women in Synagogue Ritual

In recognition of its 36th anniversary, Beth Tikvah Synagogue is presenting a program of study that focuses on the changing role of women in synagogue ritual.

This series has two tiers. Four study sessions, each led by an academic scholar, will examine the textual sources that relate to women's participation in synagogue ritual and explain the development of Jewish law. Appropriate tracts will be distributed for study.

Three conversational debates moderated by Rabbi Wayne Allen allow guest rabbis with differing opinions to share their views. Lively discussion will offer disparate opinions about the participation of women in synagogue ritual in the Conservative movement.

IDF captain defends Israel in the media

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As IDF spokesperson for foreign media, Captain Sharon Feingold says she is fighting on a new kind of front line. Part of the problem, she told an audience of 200 women last week, is that Israelis are responding with logic rather than emotion to the current intifidah.

"We know we are right and that what we're doing is just, but we just are not getting it across," she said at this year's UJA Federation Lion of Judah lunch, held at the Four Seasons Hotel.

The Lion of Judah pin is presented to women who make contributions of at least $5,000 to the annual UJA Federation campaign. There were 75 new Lions this year, announced Hinda Silber, chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy 2003, which has raised more than $6 million this year.

The funds will help provide increased security for Israel's pre-schoolers, critical care for terror victims and essential services for Israel's vulnerable, Silber said.

"I feel very much at home here, something I don't feel often in my current job," said Feingold, who has appeared on CNN and CBC. Yet her belief in her work gives her a great sense of satisfaction, she remarked.

An IDF officer whose task was to train new women recruits, Feingold earned a master's degree in international relations from the University of Amsterdam after completing her compulsory army service. She returned from Europe voluntarily when the situation in Israel "started smelling of war.

"People thought I was crazy to go back to the army, give up my life." Her current position, which she took on two years ago, means a seven-day-a-week, 24-hour-a-day commitment, she said.

"You should be proud of us, proud of Israeli soldiers who are your children and my friends, who have been brought up to value life. In Jewish life, life is the most precious thing, and I'm afraid that the other side doesn't see it that way," she said.

"It's appalling to me to watch the Palestinian TV and see the mother of 10 say that she hopes her other nine children will be suicide bombers. I find that incomprehensible, and I cannot as a woman begin to think what is going through her head."

Unfortunately, noted Feingold, there is only one television station in the Palestinian Authority. "It brainwashes the children's minds and the women's minds. Not being exposed to other sources of information, they buy that."

In the eyes of the world, the Palestinians are the underdogs – the Davids – and the Israelis are the Goliaths, said Feingold.

"We don't want to be in Palestinian areas. We'd much rather be somewhere else, but I know that if my soldiers were not there in Nablus, Qalqilya and Jenin, they'd be unable to stop this lone suicide bomber from entering our cities... In a sense they're our last barrier, our last frontier."

Since the terror attacks on the United States last Sept. 11, North Americans are beginning to understand what Israel is fighting for, she said.

Because Israel is a democracy with free media access, "it's very difficult." In Palestinian-controlled areas, if journalists take pictures that are not pleasing to the Palestinian Authority, they can have their cameras taken or even risk their lives, she said.

The Palestinians have "a good PR machine," said Feingold, "but we have the facts, and we are right. We're human and we are scared, but we're resilient and we're strong."

It's Nobody's Choice... But Your Own.

Nobody can dictate which funeral chapel a family must use. By law, there are no formal or binding agreements between synagogues, burial societies, cemeteries, and funeral chapels.

Deciding on a funeral chapel is an important family decision. The decision is yours; the choice is clear.

Former premier warns against rise of anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With the collapse of Nazi Germany in 1945, civilized people believed the most vicious expressions of anti-Semitism were discredited for all time.

But today, said former Ontario premier Bob Rae, you can find numerous manifestations of anti-Jewish stereotyping in the mainstream media.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has been depicted in a London newspaper with a big hooked nose; in an Italian publication, a cartoon showed the baby Jesus facing Israeli tanks, while in the Arab world the television media present a barrage of images of Jews as inhuman, unfeeling tyrants.

Bob Rae

It is unclear whether today's manifestations of anti-Semitism mark a return to the 1930s, but, said Rae, "we face a particular spectre and challenge that we must face up to and take seriously and ask our government to take seriously."

Rae recently delivered a stirring address about the dangers of contemporary anti-Semitism at a public lecture attended by an audience of 550 at the University of Toronto. The event was sponsored by Canadians Against Anti-Semitism. Prof. Ed Morgan served as moderator.

Rae, the former Ontario New Democratic Party (NDP) leader, was the keynote speaker discussing the riot at Concordia University on Sept. 9 at which anti-Israel protesters prevented former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking.

"I wanted to be here tonight because... I've been deeply troubled by the way in which the tragic conflict in the Middle East has... given rise to what we can feel and sense is a dramatic increase in anti-Semitism in Canada and the world," Rae said.

Rae acknowledged the right to advance criticism of Israeli policies and leaders. But, he continued, "that's not what's happening."

Instead, he said, many opponents of Israel are taking the position "that Israel does not have a right to exist as a member of the world order and that Jews do not have the right to their own state. Don't tell me that isn't anti-Semitism, because I can think of no greater threat to the life of the Jewish people."

Earlier this year, Rae came down harshly on NDP foreign affairs critic Svend Robinson when he attempted to walk past an Israeli cordon and visit Yasser Arafat in his besieged compound in Ramallah.

At the U of T last week, Rae also was critical of the CBC for reporting on the so-called "Jenin massacre" and for not admitting it had been duped about the story. "Don't jump on every bandwagon every time there's a headline that an atrocity has been committed," he said. Rae was followed onstage by McGill student Yoni Petel, who was a member of the Hillel organizing committee that invited Netanyahu to speak at Concordia.

The riot, he said, grew out of a pre-existing climate of intimidation on campus. "What happened on Sept. 9 has to be seen in that context," he said.

Irwin Cotler

Chants of "kill the Jews" can be heard at anti-Israel protests, while posters critical of Israel are found around Concordia. Information tables (which are now banned at Concordia) have carried "disinformation" claiming Palestinians were subject to genocide and that Israel is an apartheid state, he said.

In another address, Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente asked, "Why is it that without anyone paying attention, Israel-bashing has become so popular, especially among our academic elites?"

Though tolerance and diversity are valued on campus, "the only hate speech on campus that is tolerated is hate speech about Israel and America, and they are linked."

Wente attributed the anti-Israel "vitriol" to "the way the left has constructed its view on the world and its need for villains."

The left, she continued, ignores oppression by non-whites and paints privileged white people as the only oppressors. Israel, full of muscular, privileged white people who are friends of the United States, now has replaced South Africa as its chief villain while the Palestinians now stand-in for blacks.

Montreal MP Irwin Cotler, a professor of law, outlined his perspective on "a global, violent and lethal anti-Semitism."

Cotler, who surveyed various manifestations of anti-Semitism around the world, argued that traditional anti-Semitism – the denial of the right of Jews to live openly in society – is in decline. But it has been replaced by a new anti-Semitism. It denies "the rights of the Jewish people to live as equal members in the family of nations."

The new anti-Semitism also contains a genocidal element, little reported in the media, in which Hamas and other Islamic extremists call for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews.

Nevertheless, he said, "2002 is not 1942." A Jewish state exists today and Jews have moral and intellectual resources at their disposal. Furthermore, he added, "there are non-Jews who are prepared to stand by and be counted."

Forgiving Arafat his sins, always

As these words were written, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State William Burns was shuffling between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, trying to secure some measure of agreement between them on merely the approach to considering, and not the actual substance of, the peace proposal by U.S. President George W. Bush called, cautiously enough, a Road Map to a Permanent Two-State Solution.

Even conceding some element of truth in the cynic's derision that peddling a "road map" at this precise juncture is as much an attempt by the president to pave a smooth road toward Baghdad as it is to move toward peace between Israelis and Palestinians, the administration's activism does, nevertheless, warrant commendation as well. For it is, at least, an attempt to bring the two back to the table.

But even this salutary aspect of President Bush's activity has been dismissed outright by the commentators and pundits who reflexively object to American-led peace initiatives in the Middle East. This attitude was typified in a commentary that appeared last week in The New York Times by Gareth Evans and Robert Malley of the International Crisis Group.

What appeared to most bother Evans and Malley about the American initiative is that it is predicated upon the need to reform the political structure of the Palestine Authority (PA). "If Palestinians," they argue, "are not offered a clear and credible way for Israel's occupation to end and a comprehensive settlement to be reached, moderate Palestinians will have little to offer."

Where have Evans and Malley been the last two and a half years?

What was the offer by former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak to PA President Yasser Arafat and to the Palestinian people at Camp David, and later at Taba in the summer and fall of 2000, if not "a clear and credible way for Israel's occupation to end and a comprehensive settlement to be reached?"

Not only did Arafat reject the offer, he refused to propose a counter-offer. Not only did he refuse to propose a counter-offer, he unleashed a war upon the Israeli people. Not only did he unleash war, he let loose the anarchic, evil, violent hatred of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. And not only did he let loose Hamas and Islamic Jihad, but, as it has now come to light through statements of various Palestinian officials and in documents found in the PA compound in Ramallah, Arafat's rejection of negotiations and resort to war had been planned from the very start.

Proof of these plans was the decisive factor in the American administration's call for reform of the corrupt, duplicitous, untrustworthy political structure of the PA. And yet, Evans and Malley would ignore the evidence. Instead of holding the Palestinian leadership to account, they prefer an international peace conference "at which the key parties could place a blueprint for a comprehensive settlement on the table."

They would exculpate Arafat and forgive him again for all his deadly treachery.

More on the Claims Conference

I was pleased that Eli Pfefferkorn expressed so eloquently the frustrations felt by Holocaust survivors in general, and Jewish Holocaust survivors of Canada in particular ("A survivor's claim against the Claims Conference," CJN, Sept 5).

It is true that the Claims Conference was successful in its negotiations with Germany for reparation payments for Holocaust survivors. At the same time, Holocaust survivors have not seen the benefits of the billions of dollars that are available.

In Canada, we Holocaust survivors came to the realization very late that we were not adequately represented at the conference. We also had no idea about how allocations were made or to whom they were made. Even though a number of us were very involved with other Holocaust survivors, none of us received conference reports. Many of us felt strongly that we were being shunted aside by the organizations representing Canadian Jewry.

Last year, we obtained one seat for a Canadian Holocaust survivor at the conference , to be filled by Michael Rosenberg. It is our hope that he will be successful in his efforts on behalf of Canadian survivors, particularly those who are sick and in need of assistance and home care. We wish Rosenberg success. We know he will present our case well.

Lawyer Karas should check facts

Toronto immigration lawyer Sergio Karas should be pleased with his contribution to the decision of Immigration Minister Denis Coderre requiring citizens of Saudi Arabia to obtain a temporary resident visa to enter Canada. But Karas felt the need to disparage the efforts of community organizations in this dossier, an attitude that is as unhelpful as it is factually wrong.

Last February, I wrote to Minister Coderre just weeks into his tenure as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and said: "We remain concerned that Saudi Arabia is not on the list of countries that require visitor visas. We find this to be a serious omission given the proportion of active members of al-Qaeda who are Saudi citizens and that of the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks, 15 were of Saudi nationality. Canada is demonstrating its leadership role in the war against terrorism with the deployment of our troops in Afghanistan. In that spirit, and mindful of the specifications of UNSC Resolution 1373 [Article (2) Section (g)], we respectfully urge you to review Canada's visa policy regarding Saudi Arabia."

I trust this sets the record straight.

Two sides to Malev Airlines story?

I am surprised that you would publish the article by Daniel Roth accusing Hungarian airline staff of anti-Semitism ("Anti-Semitism strong in eastern Europe: A personal story of encoutering intolerance," CJN, Oct. 10). My wife and I have flown Malev many times, including on connecting flights from Budapest to Tel Aviv, and have been treated with the greatest courtesy. I have done Jewish genealogical research all over Hungary, and received only the best treatment from government officials and librarians. Sadly, there is anti-Semitism in eastern Europe, and it is more common there than in Canada. However, the Hungarian government has made considerable efforts to stamp it out in official circles. I find it hard to believe that the Hungarian airline routinely pursues extreme disciplinary action against unruly teenaged passengers simply because they are Jewish. There are usually two sides to every story.

Report on Jewish MPs' silence

I would like to see an article on the lack of response from Jewish MPs and senators to the increasing world hostility towards Jews and Israel. In the United States, you don't have to look far to see Jewish and Christian members of the Senate and Congress speaking out against anti-Semitic and anti-Israel statements and actions. As the Canadian goverment tries to take away the charitable status of the Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom, our MPs and senators are silent.

No one speaks out against the increasing anti-Semitism in our country. I would like to see some strong reporting from The CJN about this serious issue in our community.

Give credit where it's due

On Oct. 17, The CJN ran a report on Haim and Edna Avraham's recent visit to Canada and Parliament ("Kidnapped soldier's father urges action"). While the caption on the front-page photo read that the Canada-Israel Committee sponsored the trip, substantial credit should also be given to Danni Fine of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who was instrumental in facilitating the Avrahams' Canadian tour.

The success of the Avrahams' visit indicates what can be achieved when various communal agencies and grassroots activists such as Ra'anana Goldhar join together to make the case for Israel.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut at 90

By RABBI JOHN MOSCOWITZ

This has been a singular rabbinic career: a congregational rabbi in Chicago and then St. Paul from 1939 to 1961; senior rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple from 1961 to 1977 and the senior scholar of the congregation these past 25 years; one of the leading rabbinic figures on the international scene; a major communal figure in Toronto and throughout this country; an advisor on refugee law and human rights to the Canadian government; and author of arguably the most important Torah commentary of the 20th century; and more.

This has been the rabbinic career of W. Gunther Plaut. As he turns 90 years old on Nov. 1, we at Holy Blossom Temple, along with many of his friends and family, will celebrate his birthday with him. As such, now is as good a time as any to ask the obvious question: Why exactly has Rabbi Plaut been such a success over the years? What has allowed him to accomplish so much in one life?

Let me suggest three reasons for Rabbi Plaut's success.

The first reason has to do with the world he left behind, yet managed to bring with him to these shores. Rabbi Plaut emerged from a world that valued knowledge and classical learning, a Europe that cultivated an informed and literate citizenry. When he left Berlin at age 22, he did so with a law degree in hand, and a head full of learning. Raised in a home with books at its centre, he was imbued with the ideas in them.

Though a product of liberal Berlin, he was hardly bereft of Judaism when he arrived in America. Shabbat, kashrut and Yom Tov were staples in the Plaut home. In Albeck, Heschel, Bamburger and Baeck, he had been exposed to some of the great Jewish thinkers and scholars of the 20th century. And so while Rabbi Plaut's Jewish learning was not yet deep, his intellectual foundation was solid and he had learned how to learn. That foundation provided him with a sense of place, even as he prepared to move half a world away. He was already, first, a Jew.

This identification with his people provided Rabbi Plaut with a point of view that would not waver, even in America. "I did not accept tradition as immutable, but neither was I prepared to overlook it or discard it as irrelevant or nearly so," he was quoted as saying in the Central Conference of American Rabbis Journal in 1980.

This intellectual position was also an existential one: Rabbi Plaut was steadfastly a Jew, even as the winds of change had begun to gather. The idea of honouring both past and present was also integral to his milieu: the great world of 19th- and early 20th-century Jewish Berlin, a world rich in learning, liberalism and literacy. It was here, too, that Rabbi Plaut's lifelong habits of discipline and productivity were honed.

The second reason for Rabbi Plaut's success is more elusive than his European background, yet no less salient a factor: a remarkably adaptive personality that, nonetheless, does not readily brook compromise with principle.

This personal flexibility within a rather steadily built life meant that Rabbi Plaut became an acculturated and patriotic American, and then a deeply appreciative Canadian – both without losing his European sensibility or his loyalty to either of his host countries. This apparent dichotomy is at the heart of his unique relationships to the countries and lands that shaped him – and which have been, in a small way, shaped by him.

Rabbi Plaut is a European through and through, particularly a 20th-century Middle-European Jew, with the appropriate distrust of the political extremes that ravaged Europe. As a European, he well understands the uniquely European notion of the relationship between community and society: one's intimacy with community allows one to be part of larger society. Few have used the platform of their own community to serve the society as well as Rabbi Plaut.

He is also an acculturated North American. Knowing, as linguists tell us, that a foreign accent is normally retained upon arrival in a new country only after age 13, I was fascinated the first time I heard Rabbi Plaut speak. Here was a man who came to America from Germany at age 22, who had, nonetheless, only retained the broad outlines of his accent – which, even then, is not easily identifiable as German. He tells us in his memoirs that he worked hard to lose that accent in those early days. He sought to accommodate himself to America, so important was the need to be accepted in his new country.

But it is more than that, of course. What may be an aspect of personality – the wish for acceptance – is also a matter of being a refugee from a certain time and place.

Both the desire for acceptance and the distrust of political extremism became clear when he remarked to me in the midst of the 1988 Canadian federal elections: "Given that as a man of the community, I normally keep my personal politics somewhat private, I bet you haven't a clue as to how I will vote."

"Of course I know exactly how you will vote," I told him and he looked at me utterly surprised. "How did you know?!"

I didn't tell him all that I knew from watching and listening closely: that a man of his past and place might be spurred to reconcile differing views and be inclined toward a particular temperament for adjudication – and would therefore prefer the party in the middle. The rational and elegant culture of fin de siècle Berlin, and the poisonous passions that spewed forth from Germany after World War I, have together remained in the shadows of Rabbi Plaut's life. They have modulated his views, providing him with fixed principles and personal flexibility to work for civility, an ordered society for all citizens and a distinct place within it for the Jews.

The third reason for Rabbi Plaut's success is the most compelling. Given his teacher Jacob Rader Marcus's admonishment to him upon leaving rabbinical school that he was "quite unprepared to lead an American congregation," we might wonder how he managed to overcome his illustrious professor's doubts and exceed all expectations. After all, Rabbi Plaut was a greenhorn: his accent in those days was still thick, his grasp of the English language, while extensive, was still awkward, his mannerisms a bit foreign and rough around the edges.

What, then, made the difference? Rabbi Plaut's success in those early years, as well as later, is owed overwhelmingly to Elizabeth Strauss Plaut. Her no-nonsense common sense, her humour, her acute sensitivity to pretence and her love made a scholar also a mensch, a foreigner a native – and most importantly, a rabbi of the word also a rabbi of the deed.

As Rabbi Plaut's anchor, Elizabeth was the one who, in the early days, when adulation grew too great, reminded him not to be taken in by it all. Her ambitions were not for his fame, but rather for his satisfaction and for that of the people he served. Anyone who has watched Rabbi Plaut around Elizabeth knows that she is the private ballast for this public man. Though ill these past three years, she remains his inspiration, and his success is still shared by two.

Finally, a personal note: While I cannot say that Rabbi Plaut dramatically shaped my own views – they were in place when he and I became office neighbours 15 years ago – I can say that he motivated me to speak them differently than I did before, more clearly and passionately, and without fear of consequence.

Not necessarily alike in past or personality, Rabbi Plaut and I are very much kindred spirits in values. My own values – of community taking precedence over the individual, of the requirement to read and to learn, my love for Israel and my deep belief that Judaism is serious business and nothing else – have been reinforced by observing and listening to this unique rabbi. If I say more clearly and passionately what I believe today, it is in part because of Rabbi Plaut. Because my own rabbinate is different, better than it would have been otherwise, I stand in awe and gratitude as one of many who salute him as he turns 90.

Blaming the victim

The Christian New Testament has long been cited as teaching that Jews themselves should be blamed for being persecuted, and this ancient point of view has recently been an issue in the American press.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Earlier this month, the Washington Jewish Week ran an editorial titled "Washington Times ad blames Jews as victims." Quoting from the New Testament, the ad in question, which was signed by a Baltimore man, suggested that Jews may suffer persecution because they delivered Jesus to the Romans to be crucified.

There were many complaints. An accusation of bad faith was vigorously denied by the Times, as well as by the advertisement's author, who should never have used the disputed language. It was phrased badly enough to allow for either a positive or a negative interpretation. The national advertising editor of the Times said he was out of town when the ad was published.

The fact is that American Jews are sensitive when it comes to public relations. In that regard they are no different from their Canadian cousins, who are sometimes accused of being overly sensitive and of feeling less secure than American Jews.

After spending some time south of the border, I am not sure there is any meaningful difference. A minority anywhere is likely to experience some isolation and, thus, often react defensively. That is natural and universal.

Yet, U.S. Jews are, on the whole, a very secure group whose numbers have recently been cited to amount to about five million – a bit lower than the usually quoted figure of six million. I have no way of knowing the correct number, but certainly enough Jews live in the United States to allow for a broad-based and vigorous community life.

Withal, American Jews remain aware that they are a minority, which means they watch their public relations with some attention. In that regard, I found no palpable difference between them and Canadian Jews. That difference may have existed in the past, but it is not noticeable today.

Being both a Canadian and American citizen, I feel thoroughly at home in both countries, something that I consider a special blessing.

Some 67 years ago, I fled Nazi Germany and went to the United States, and from there, 30 years later, I came to Canada. I have been very fortunate in my peregrinations and habitats and often feel that it was my blessed fate to experience the best of all worlds.

How would it have been if I had settled in what was then Palestine? That, of course, is something I will never know.

Powerful film explores hatred and self-loathing

"I hate and I love/ who can tell me why?" – Catullus

After my last column on the emotion of hate and the actions that perpetuate it, I resolved to write of happier matters this time. But the flood of e-mails I received left me unwilling to let the subject matter rest for now.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

For the most part, my readers seemed to agree with me and the sentiments I expressed. Especially lately, in light of the recent terrorist bombing in Bali, it is not shocking that people find hate, not love, is making their world go around.

"I share many of your feelings… I used to be an eternal optimist but am having a hard time being one these days," wrote one of my readers. "I was in Bali last year… I went to the Sari night club."

Another reader empathized in particular with my account of having been bullied in junior high school, as his children have experienced the same thing.

"If someone hates you, except for very rare circumstances, you will never be able to make them change their mind," he wrote.

"But making them change their mind is not up to you. What is up to you is to make them respect and/or fear you. The elements of respect and fear are very adept at countering the feelings of hate. In the end, they can create a more stable situation."

How interesting, I thought to myself, that what is true for relationships between people can so often be applied to relationships between states.

My own definition of hatred was significantly expanded last week because of a controversial and extremely powerful movie I saw called The Believer.

Written and directed by Henry Bean, a Conservative Jew from Philadelphia, the film won a Grand Jury Prize at last year's Sundance Film Festival, but was only recently able to find a distributor due to its explosive content.

It is loosely based on the true story of Daniel Burrows, a member of the American Nazi Party and the Ku Klux Klan in the 1960s who committed suicide when the New York Times revealed his true identity.

Though he was a notorious neo-Nazi, he was also a Jew – and a former yeshiva student to boot.

As I sat in the dark theatre trying to absorb the huge mass of contradictions that strangle the life of Danny Balint, the film's protagonist, a mass of questions fluttered through my mind.

For one, how is it possible to live a life where everything you stand for goes against who you are? And of all possible times, do we really need a film about a Jewish neo-Nazi right now?

The film opens with a wrenching, intensely uncomfortable scene in a subway train. A young man wearing a kippah is hunched over a textbook. Balint spots him and deftly crowds into his space, standing above him and trying to squarely crush the Talmudic scholar's toes underneath his hefty black boot.

The would-be victim does not utter a word – the camera focuses on this ridiculous dance of toes for awhile until they both exit the train, with Balint quick to follow the young student. He knocks him down on the ground, savagely punching him in the head, all the while screaming, "Hit me! Hit me!"

Balint desperately wants a Jew to have the opportunity to strike back at a skinhead – even if it's him. Later, he berates a group of Holocaust survivors for not having fought back against their captors.

He defends his ideology and his violent actions through his interpretation of Judaism as a religion that spawns victimhood and helplessness. It is good for the Jews to be hated, he declares to a room full of fellow fascists.

"The worse the Jews are hated, the stronger they become," Balint proclaims.

"Auschwitz created Israel."

At the end of the movie, I left with far more questions than answers, which I assume means the film – and its important message – had achieved its purpose.

Perhaps if we understood hatred's inextricable ties to self-loathing, we would be better able to understand it.

A starting point for pro-Israel campus advocacy

Every week for the past few months, I have picked up my campus paper to see what anti-Israel views have made the opinions page. In September, a "report" on the Concordia University riots blamed the police for restraining the Palestinian protesters. Last week, a young woman asked readers how, after watching brutal images of victimized Palestinians on Arab media, she could not feel justified to "spit, attack, throw pennies and swear at an Israeli prime minister responsible for such devastation."

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

As I read these weekly diatribes, I feel sick to my stomach. I find it amazing that ignorance can be so prevalent, especially at a university, supposedly a place of higher learning.

It is incredibly frightening to consider that the media are seen by many as the source of ultimate truth. We have become captivated by images on screens, and rarely do we take the time to consider the validity of what we see.

We struggle to reconcile ourselves to, or at the very least disregard, the biased messages we receive from the other side. We cling to the facts we know, believing we are part of a minority that grasps the reality of the situation. What scares me is that those who advocate against us feel just as strongly as we do. They see a logic in their views that, while oblivious and irrational to us, is wholly irrefutable to them.

It has become habitual for both sides to engage the other in a recycling of ideologies, facts and assertions that in the end only leaves each side assured of its own position. Seeing the process unfold in the campus press each week is cause for insanity. There is a sort of stupidity inherent in the whole process.

Is there a point to discussion when the possibility for open-minded resolution doesn't exist? When you are so secure in your own "facts," how can any question receive more than a dogmatic response?

That was the paradox I found myself trapped in as I prepared for a recent weekend trip to Collingwood, Ont., where I was to work on our campus' Israel advocacy campaign. Despite my deep-rooted feelings for Israel and my desire to defend it in any public forum, I couldn't help but feel restricted by the futility of the cycle. You can only speak to those who are willing to listen, and so few are.

But my perspective on the whole issue evolved that weekend. I had always seen Israel advocacy as a battle to be won, but I now realize I had my eye on the wrong opponent. It's one thing to battle anti-Israel advocates on campus who have nothing but the same rhetoric to spew. Yes, we're trying to counter these people, but they are also the ones who will never even try to see things from our point of view.

We can throw out slogans and print our own thought-provoking propaganda, and it may very well cause some people to give the issue a second thought. And yes, any such accomplishment is significant, but there is something greater we must aspire to.

Avraham Infeld, the founder of Melitz, a Zionist education organization, articulated this in the most beautiful terms. He said we are so engaged in trying to convince others to like Israel that we neglect to foster a love for Israel.

On campus, there are many battles to be fought, and there's no way to fight them all. But for the first time, someone has given me a place to start. Our first obligation must be to Jewish students. How can we hope to affect those with no connection without reaching the very people whose seeds are rooted but are missing the nutrients needed for growth?

I spent 10 years in a Zionist day school and am a passionate spokesperson for Israel, but until that weekend, I couldn't explain the link between my Judaism and my passion for Israel.

We act on an impulse that we don't quite understand, but we must articulate that link.

Before we have any hope of being true advocates on campus, we must reach Jewish students, those who are in most need of an answer. We must understand why we love Israel.

The Kirshner File

As war in Iraq looms, U.S. reins in Israel

The countdown to a U.S. invasion of Iraq, with regime change as its primary objective, has begun. The United States is moving troops and equipment to the Middle East. Military exercises have taken place. The House of Representatives and the Senate have given President George W. Bush the green light to take action, if necessary, against Saddam Hussein. Washington is pressing the United Nations Security Council to pass a blunt resolution threatening force if Iraq does not fully co-operate with UN arms inspectors seeking to destroy its conventional and non-conventional weapons of mass destruction. Bush administration officials warn that the United States may act unilaterally.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But perhaps the surest sign that the region is teetering on the edge of war was Israel's uncharacteristic restraint in the aftermath of the latest suicide bombing, the 79th since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising.

On Oct. 21, two Islamic Jihad suicide bombers near Hadera drove a sports utility vehicle alongside a bus and detonated an explosion, killing themselves and 14 Israelis. In deference to Washington's concerns that a major reprisal might complicate U.S. efforts to finish off Saddam, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon did not order an immediate retaliation, and one of his advisors, Dore Gold, said that Israel will "certainly take into account America's regional considerations."

After the last Islamic Jihad operation on June 5, which killed 17 Israeli bus riders, Israel struck back within hours. The Israeli army, yet again, besieged the compound of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. Israel also re-occupied major towns in the Palestinian autonomous area, thereby rolling back territorial gains the Palestinians had made in the West Bank since the start of the now-defunct Oslo peace process.

Sharon's decision to exercise restraint after Oct. 21 was in keeping with Israel's current policy of refraining from actions that might inflame the Arab world as the United States readies itself for a historic military campaign in Iraq. The toppling of Saddam's totalitarian government, the sooner the better, is clearly in Israel's long-term national interest, as Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai remarked last week. Iraq, which fired scores of Scud missiles at Israel and Saudi Arabia in the 1991 Gulf War, in an unsuccessful bid to break up the international coalition arrayed against Baghdad, is a menace not only to Israel but to its Arab neighbours as well. Israel, therefore, understands the necessity of keeping its military impulses in check, for now at least.

Israel, certainly, has accounts to settle with undying enemies such as Islamic Jihad and Hamas, both of which vehemently oppose its very existence. Since the outbreak of the intifadah, close to 300 Israelis have fallen victim to suicide bombings, a terrible toll for a country Israel's size. But Sharon, his hawkish views notwithstanding, realizes that it would be foolhardy and counter-productive to lash out at this incredibly sensitive moment, when the United States is manoeuvring Iraq into its cross hairs.

Cognizant that Israel should lay relatively low for the time being, Sharon has indefinitely postponed a planned invasion of the Gaza Strip, which is rife with Islamic Jihad and Hamas cells. But he has not put a stop to minor incursions into Gaza.

Since last spring, when Israeli armour stormed into the West Bank in Operation Defensive Shield and Operation Determined Path, there has been talk in Israel of uprooting the terrorist infrastructure in Gaza. In early October, in a prelude to such an invasion, Israel struck the town of Khan Yunis, leaving 17 Palestinians, many of them civilians, dead.

The United States, having previously turned a blind eye to Israel's practice of raiding the West Bank and Gaza, was "deeply troubled" by the Khan Yunis incident. Yet Washington's reaction was anything but surprising. Last year, in an attempt to mobilize Arab and Muslim support for its intended invasion of Afghanistan, the Bush administration adopted a two-pronged strategy. It called on Israel to curtail its raids into the Palestinian autonomous areas and stepped up efforts to end the intifadah through diplomatic means.

With the United States poised to invade Iraq unless Saddam disarms to its complete satisfaction, this pattern has become apparent again.

In recent weeks, Washington has expressed misgivings about the growing number of Palestinian civilian casualties caused by Israeli fire. Since June, the Israeli army has mistakenly killed almost 50 Palestinian civilians, about half of them children, in the West Bank and Gaza. Amnesty International has accused Israel of reckless shooting and shelling of Palestinian neighbourhoods. B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights group, claims that 15 Palestinians have been fatally shot in the past four months by soldiers enforcing curfews.

In tandem with this criticism, the United States has scolded Israel for violating a promise to relieve economic and social distress among Palestinians. Due to American pressure, Israel agreed to transfer tens of millions of dollars in tax revenues to the Palestinian Authority. Israel froze these funds, collected from Palestinian workers, out of fear that they would finance the intifadah.

Washington has also urged Israel to withdraw from Palestinian towns in the West Bank, just as it forced Israel on Sept. 29 to end its 10-day siege of Arafat's headquarters. Though empathizing with Israel's resort to closures and blockades to combat terrorism, the United States believes that Israel should ease its restrictions. Complying with Washington's wishes, Israel, on Oct. 18, moved out of the centre of Jenin, a hotbed of Palestinian militancy. But on Oct. 25, Israel swept back into Jenin, in an operation designed to arrest wanted men and capture munitions.

On another front, Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, bowing to American requests for calm and burnishing his sagging fortunes in the Labor party ahead of a Nov. 19 leadership primary, has begun dismantling illegal outposts in the West Bank.

Ariel Sharon

Consisting of caravans, tents and containers, these encampments were erected by Jewish zealots after 1996. Ironically, some were established during Sharon's brief tenure as foreign minister under the premiership of Benjamin Netanyahu. Sharon, it will be recalled, incited settlers to seize hillsides to fortify Israel's claim to the West Bank. Of 30 such unauthorized settlements Ben-Eliezer has vowed to remove, 21 have been taken down so far. More than 70 remain in place, clearly tolerated by Sharon.

Another arena where the United States seeks tranquility is Lebanon. With Iraq in mind, Washington has defused a row turning on Lebanon's unilateral diversion of the Wazzani River. A tributary of the Hasbani River, the Wazzani flows into the Jordan River, which, in turn, spills into the Sea of Galilee, Israel's biggest body of fresh water.

About a month ago, Sharon warned Beirut not to divert the Wazzani, saying that a diversion would be grounds for war. Defiantly, Lebanon ignored the warning and began pumping the river. Israel gritted its teeth, having been restrained by the United States.

The dispute, which revolves around the permissible quantity of water that Lebanon is legally entitled to, could spiral out of control if Israel bombs Lebanese facilities and if Hezbollah, its arch foe, gets involved.

In the hope of winning Arab acquiescence for an invasion of Iraq, the United States has presented a plan, yet another one, to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict. Last week, William Burns, the U.S. undersecretary of state, was in the Middle East promoting Bush's "road map" for a peace agreement.

The "road map" imposes obligations on both sides. The Palestinians would submit to a truce and reform the Palestinian Authority. Israel would pull back to pre-intifadah positions and freeze construction in settlements. The Palestinians would be granted provisional statehood with temporary borders, and final status negotiations would be completed in 2005.

How this scheme squares with comments made by David Satterfield, the U.S. deputy assistant secretary for Mideast affairs, is difficult to ascertain. Recently, Satterfield disclosed that the Arab-Israeli dispute will not be Washington's "top priority" after a war in Iraq. The post-Saddam era, he noted, would be used to foster stability and democracy in Iraq and the Arab world.

All these concerns notwithstanding, the most pressing issue facing the United States in the runup to a war is what Israel will do if attacked by Iraq. In a White House meeting with Sharon earlier this month, their seventh in less than two years, Bush said he fully expects Israel to answer an unprovoked Iraqi strike. But in essence, the United States wants Israel to sit out a war, as it did in 1991.

Two weeks ago, in a New York Times interview, Sharon said that Israel will "show sensitivity" to U.S. needs. But in a caveat, he declared, "If our citizens are attacked seriously, by a weapon of mass destruction, and suffer casualties, then Israel will respond."

And so Sharon has thrown down the gauntlet.

How Do We Celebrate Shabbat and Holidays in Bet Hayeled?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

"Ask any child in Nursery, Junior or Senior Kindergarten what their favourite day is, and they will tell you it is Friday. "The spirit of Shabbat fills the classroom – from the smell of challah to the taste of grape juice to the sight of candles," explains Bet Hayeled Vice Principal Susan Herberman. Jewish holidays are celebrated with class plays, sing-a-longs, and thematic arts and crafts. Parents and grandparents are always welcome. "It's hard to tell who's having more fun, the guests or the children," says Herberman.

Holocaust exhibit captures survivors' lives

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The recently installed gallery of Holocaust survivor portraits along a 75-foot corridor at the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto is one-of-a-kind.

Titled We Who Survived..., the exhibit, which opened in September, tells the stories of 69 of the centre's survivors/speakers with large hand-crafted photographs, archival photographs and memorabilia. Uniquely mounted biographies behind the photographs tell the details of the survivors' lives before, during and after the war.

Survivor Elly Gotz, the project's installation designer, recognized the challenge of a small exhibition area. His sliding wall design, with a complicated series of rails that move the photographs into position revealing the biographical boards, is creative and makes effective use of the space.

Visual artist, sculptor and painter David Abecassis, the exhibit's installation artist, said as viewers interact physically with the work and expose the biographical information, they educate themselves about the Holocaust.

"The work is designed to address ignorance and apathy about the reality of the Jewish Holocaust," he said. "I felt it was important that young people who visit the Holocaust Centre see actual documents and photographs from the time."

To add another unique element to the exhibit, photographer and documentary filmmaker Leib Kopman, who spent a day with each survivor, produced large black-and-white photographs that depict the personal interests of each individual rather than the usual headshots.

"The creative aspect of this project was life defining for me," Kopman said. "I wanted to communicate just how amazing and dynamic the survivors are. It was a spiritual endeavour being connected and sharing life's cherished moments with these survivors."

The exhibit, which uses the selenium and Giclee processes for archival quality photographs and high resolution digital images, was curated by Carla Shapiro.

Survivor Judy Cohen, who thought of the idea, chaired the 18-month project.

After its official opening last month, several participating survivors expressed appreciation that "we mounted the exhibit while they were still alive," Cohen said.

"They told me that they could share it with their children, grandchildren and the community and they enjoyed the tribute," she said.

Five of the original survivors have died since the project began.

"When I became aware that five speakers had died, I realized that if we wanted to create a permanent tribute, we would have to do it now," Cohen said, adding that the exhibit emphasizes survival and renewal.

Survivors Elly Gotz, the installation designer of the recently opened exhibit, We Who Survived..., and Judy Cohen, the exhibit's initiator and chair, in the corridor at the exhibit.

More than 25,000 schoolchildren visit the Holocaust Centre each year. They view a half-hour video of the Holocaust and meet for an hour with a survivor. Some survivors volunteer to visit schools to tell students their stories.

"These [testimonies] have made their audiences more aware of the terrible consequences of hate," Cohen said.

Howard Driman, the centre's chair, said the exhibit "is of tremendous educational value. I think it could be seen as a response to Holocaust denial. In this exhibition, you see hope and vitality – the survivors have gone on to be creative people – artists, writers, sculptors, business people, educators and many other wonderful people – the backbone of the Holocaust Centre."

The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto is located on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building at 4600 Bathurst St. We Who Survived... is a permanent exhibit unrelated to Holocaust Education Week. For more information, call 416-635-2883.

TVO director says educational TV way of the future

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In an Isaac Asimov science fiction story, a computer provides individualized lessons to schoolchildren in the comfort of their home.

Ellen Cole, TVOntario's director of communications, says that while only the human touch of a teacher can impart a love of learning, educational online and on-air programming is "the way of the future."

Ellen Cole

In its mandate to act as an adjunct to the province's formal education and training system, the broadcaster has integrated current technologies into its education wing – the e-learning centre (TVO.Org) – and now provides several online programs for high school kids, university and college students or anyone interested in learning, Cole said.

Cole, who is also national chair of community relations at Canadian Jewish Congress, is very excited about the new education wing introduced by TVOntario last spring.

There are currently four different e-learning programs available. One option, TVO.org/eureka, allows students to access live teachers five nights a week. The Eureka program also provides practice tests for provincial literacy, math and science exams.

"Around the time of provincial competency tests, use of the site bumps up practically 300 per cent," Cole said.

Other programs work in tandem with university and college classes and are required viewing for various credit courses.

"We are now in the degree and diploma granting business," which means that TVO will be well positioned to help address the double cohort crunch expected next year, Cole said.

Courses will be offered online so that students can take them in their homes if there isn't room in the classroom.

"They can download classes at their leisure," she said.

Another e-running product, Job Matters (careermatters.tvo.org/job matters), is a Web site that examines about 350 different job opportunities.

It helps anybody – high schoolers, university students, or anyone returning to the workforce – plot an educational path to the career of their choice, Cole said. High school credits and post-secondary classes for different careers are presented, as well as available apprenticeship and training programs.

The fourth product is a life-long learning site that provides access to programs to learn job skills in the nursing, automotive construction, restaurant and hospitality sectors.

Cole, who speaks four languages, studied at Forest Hill Collegiate, the University of Toronto and the University of London, before beginning her career in the communications industry at the the Royal Shakespeare Company, where she became head of publications.

After eight years working with actors such as Ben Kingsley, Allan Rickman and Judy Dench, Cole said she moved back to Canada to pursue an appointment at Centre Stage.

"I was their manager of theatre communications when they amalgamated with Toronto Free Theatre to become Canadian Stage."

From there, Cole moved on to the Stratford Festival in Ontario, where she was director of communications for six years.

"I am really a very lucky girl," Cole said, as she described her background, adding that her work at the Canadian Stratford Festival was under John Neville when he took them from a $4-million deficit to a $3-million surplus in less than two years.

While negotiating her way through the public relations difficulties that resulted from the production of The Merchant Of Venice at Stratford, Cole became involved with Canadian Jewish Congress and began volunteering.

The two worlds complement each other she said, adding, "It's simply a matter of giving 150 per cent of my time – whether dealing with anti-hate eduction, reaching out to other communities or repositioning a multi-million-dollar not-for-profit charitable organization."

legacy of life

Dora Wilensky Salsberg 1911 – 1959

a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

She was smart, sophisticated and elegant and he was caring, passionate and dashing. Together they made the perfect couple, drawing others close with their warmth and vitality.

"I never asked my brother-in-law what struck him about Dora," says her secretary and sister-in-law Rene Salsberg of labour unionist, Yiddishist, politician and journalist J.B. Salsberg. "It was obvious. She was a beautiful, dignified woman with brains and a terrific sense of humour. She became a mentor to many women because she had integrity, was passionate about her work, and was articulate and knowledgeable."

Dora Wilensky Salsberg was born in Russia around 1911. Shortly thereafter, the family settled in Toronto's east end, where Dora's father worked at a cap factory and her mother stayed home to run the household. They had little money, but Dora and her three sisters were showered with love and grew up happy and fulfilled.

The girls were also extremely ambitious, with one becoming a doctor and three carving out successful careers as social workers. Given her passion for people, Dora took the social work route. Her devotion to those in need went on to earn her much praise.

"There was something about Aunt Dora that made me feel she was very interested in what I had to say," says niece Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin. "She always put me at ease. I enjoyed spending time with her very much."

Dora's training and dedication to her profession produced many advances in her field. According to Rene, Dora was instrumental in urging the University of Toronto, her alma mater, to launch a post-graduate course in social work "so future social workers would not be just do-gooders." She was among the first to hire a psychiatric social worker and one of the first to introduce play therapy as part of patient treatment.

Dora and J.B. Salsberg at Camp Naivelt, July 1943.

"When a client once threw an inkpot at her, Dora asked herself how she had failed her client rather than get angry at being abused," says Rene.

But where Dora truly shined was as executive director of Jewish Family and Child Services (JF&CS), a position she held for more than 15 years.

"Dora was constantly on top of all the advances being made in social service agencies throughout Europe and the United States and yearned to introduce these leading-edge programs and services to Toronto's Jewish community," recalls Jerome D. Diamond, who succeeded Dora at JF&CS.

Among those innovations was working with entire families during times of crisis rather than just with the mother and one or two of the children. Jerome describes it as the beginning of family therapy, with Dora encouraging fathers to take active roles during treatment. Dora was also keen on improving the training of social agency employees and Jerome committed himself to this project once he took over her post.

All this hard work earned Dora a starring role among the Jewish women of her day. Rose Wolfe, who did her social work field placement and later her case work at JF&CS during Dora's reign, says Dora was one of few women at the time to hold such a senior position and consequently was a great influence on many people.

"As a young student I was in great awe of her," says Rose. "My most vivid recollection is that of her sailing down the corridors of the agency with that wonderful poise, that sense of purpose and always that half smile. Her staff was completely devoted to her and she, in turn, returned that loyalty. This respect and admiration were reflected in the Board and the community at large. Everyone adored her."

Yet even with all the prestige that came with being a role model, Dora's first love was still her beloved J.B. When she died of cancer in 1959, J.B. was devastated, as were both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities. To honour Dora's memory, J.B. established a memorial fund in her name that has allowed JF&CS to offer scholarships for graduate students in Jewish communal services, host volunteer appreciation events, and fund other vital services. Dora would have been proud.

Author to discuss 'Jewish' films at book fair

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

He's written a book about 55 films with Jewish content, but Bill Stern insists he's not a movie critic.

"I'm not a film critic, I just love films," says Stern, whose passion for film and theatre inspired him to write You Don't Have to be Jewish: A Film Buff's Commentary on Selected Jewish Content Films, from Lugus Publishing.

Stern will discuss the book at 3:30 on Sunday, Nov. 3 at the Leah Posluns Theatre as part of the 26th Annual Jewish Book Fair. He will be joined by Morley Torgov, author of the novel The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick and folk singer Jerry Gray, as well as Gerald Pratley, who worked as a film critic for the CBC. The program is being sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News.

After chatting about his book, Stern will show a brief clip from the movie The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick and a clip from the film The Travellers, a documentary about the folk band of the same name. Gray is the band's lead vocalist. Torgov and Gray will discuss the films, which are both profiled in Stern's book.

Stern's book surveys a wide range of films, including both well-known and obscure titles. The book is divided into five sections, and 11 films are featured in each category.

The first section deals with Canadian Jewish content films, such as the movie Spadina. The second category focuses on Yiddish films and the third discusses Israeli films. The fourth section is about Jewish content films, such as The Life of Emile Zola and the fifth section deals with Holocaust-related films such as The Wannsee Conference, which is based on minutes from the infamous 1942 meeting in which the final solution was conceived by 15 high-ranking Nazi party officials.

Stern said the 55 films he discusses in his book were chosen because "they're excellent.

"Some of them you never hear about and they deserve to be seen," he said.

All the films profiled in the book are available at the Jewish media centre, on the second floor of the Lipa Green building.

Trained as a social worker, Stern developed a love for theatre and film as a child, when he used to accompany his father on outings to the Standard Theatre, a now-defunct Yiddish theatre in Toronto.

"A lot of people read books, but more people go to see films," he said. "Films are like love. We love them, we hate them."

The book is the culmination of two years of research and writing. Stern hopes it will do more than just expose readers to some wonderful Jewish films.

"I hope the book will be a resource for Jewish cultural understanding and that it will expand readers' familiarity with Jewish values," he said.

Hi, I'm Tila MacDonald. I lost 35 lb. in 4 months with hypnosis! My dress size plunged from a plump 14 to a sleek 4 and it was effortless! My weight melted off at an average of three pounds a week! This is my true story.

BEFORE

I'd been overweight for ten years. After I turned 40, my weight started creeping up every year. I was disgusted with myself. Food seemed to have some strange control over me. I couldn't get past a bakery without loading up on breads and pastries.

I knew that my health was at risk. I attended diet workshops and tried a variety of diets on my own. Even those chalky shakes. Nothing worked.

I hid my weight with bulky jackets and loose clothing. By the time I had my first grandchild, I had all but given up. I was miserable about my appearance and my emotions were out of control.

DISCOVERY. I read about Positive Changes Hypnosis in the newspaper. I was skeptical, but I called and made an appointment for my free hypnosis evaluation.

My evaluation was easy and fun. There was no pressure. Everything was explained to me. I signed up that day.

RESULTS. I noticed an immediate change in my behaviour. I took off eight pounds my first week! It was easy! I simply relaxed and listened to my hypnotist's voice. I never used to drink water. I now enjoy drinking water every day. I used to eat a lot of sugar. No more! I eat healthier foods and enjoy them. Hypnosis helped me to eliminate cravings, food binges and poor food choices. Best of all, I never feel deprived. I'm in control again.

My waist is now four inches smaller! People call me "Skinny." And it's true! Today I am a slender 118 lb. and I owe it all to Positive Changes Hypnosis.

HEALTH BENEFITS. I no longer have panic attacks, I am more confident, my irritable bowel problems are gone and I no longer need to carry antacids. My doctor was amazed at my progress. In fact, he's been joking with me that I'll soon put him out of business with my improved health.

AFTER

THE NEW ME! There are no words that can express the difference in how I feel. I love the new me! I used to avoid mirrors. Now I'm happy with my reflection. I think the Positive Changes Hypnosis program is worth twice the price I paid. I have lost weight, gained positive feelings, increased my self-confidence and improved my health dramatically.

MY RECOMMENDATION. If you don't call, your life will probably remain the same and you will have missed out on what could have been. I urge you to pick up your telephone and call now.

'This is a time of crisis:' Dershowitz

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Students facing anti-Semitism and the delegitimation of Israel by faculty members should confront their professors, advises Alan Dershowitz.

The Harvard Law School professor and prolific author will be in Toronto Nov. 4 to speak at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign closing event at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. He told The CJN in a phone interview it's shocking how cowardly some professors are.

Alan Dershowitz

"They want to be loved by their students... Some are ignoramuses with PhDs. Most are cowards who will sign [a petition] and run but won't debate."

Through his writing and speaking, Dershowitz feels he is making a dent in the ignorance and bigotry that he said is behind the anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment that has proliferated to such an extent he believes it is the most significant issue facing the Jewish community today.

Students who consult him about their concerns over anti-Semitism on campus, tell him they now feel empowered, he said.

Dershowitz' academic colleagues are generally positive about his efforts, he said, "but they wish I would shut up. I'm not going to.

"The new big lie on campus is that all criticism of Israel is seen as anti-Semitic," he said, adding that he himself is critical of Israel in many respects.

"What is anti-Semitism," he clarified, "is singling out Israel and saying only Israel is worthy of divestiture."

Dershowitz said he is prepared to criticize Israel – he's against the settlements, for one thing – but only to criticize it in comparison with other countries.

"Israel has the best human rights record in the world, far better than France did in Algeria. Israel's record on human rights, although imperfect, is something people should praise not condemn."

In the 1990s, nobody could have anticipated the kind of anti-Semitism that is manifesting itself on university campuses in Europe, the United States and Canada today, said Dershowitz.

"This is a time of real crisis for peace-[loving] and democracy-loving people," he said.

His latest book, Why Terrorism Works, paints a potentially dire picture of the future based on current limitations in terrorism prevention. In the five months since he finished writing it, Dershowitz says the situation has worsened.

"I think terrorism is coming to Canada and the United States. I think events in Bali demonstrate that." He is pushing for an independent commission to look into the causes of the Sept. 11 bombings and also to get Israel to present its case more effectively, he said.

"The prospects are daunting. This is a great challenge."

Sifting through the ashes of Auschwitz

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

The adjoining death camps of Auschwitz and Birkenau together comprise "the best known site of suffering and murder in human history," says Teresa Swiebocka, an official of the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum.

Auschwitz-Birkenau played a pivotal role in the Final Solution, Nazi Germany's attempt to systematically destroy the entire Jewish population of Europe. From 1.1 to 1.5 million people, mostly Jews, were killed there during the Holocaust era.

No records were kept of the prisoners that arrived daily by train under severely inhumane conditions of transport; most were selected immediately for destruction in the gas chambers. About one in four were judged sufficiently healthy to be sold as slave labourers in factories, mines and other local projects. Obsessively bureaucratic, the Germans kept detailed records of these prisoners and sometimes augmented their records with photographs.

The Germans were almost as obsessive about making lists as they would later become about destroying them. As the war neared its end; they attempted to cover up their crimes by dismantling the gas chambers and burning most of their incriminating paperwork.

But some records survived, often because prisoners managed to steal them and hide them in latrines, bury them or smuggle them out. Even now, documents are still occasionally being unearthed.

The Auschwitz-Birkenau Museum was established in 1947 to preserve the site of this unprecedented atrocity; it was designated a UNESCO world heritage site in 1979.

"The museum attempts to go beyond presenting these people as anonymous victims or camp numbers or statistics," Swiebocka said during a talk at the recent Jewish genealogical conference in Toronto.

"We are trying to find their names and show their faces. They were not just people behind barbed wires, wearing striped uniforms or crowded into the gas chambers. We want to show them not just as dead bodies in fields strewn with ashes, but as people in all of their fullness."

The museum has recovered various records related to camp operations and the constant incoming flow of doomed people. For instance, 48 volumes of the Auschwitz Death Books are still in existence, containing death certificates for 69,000 prisoners between late 1941 and late 1943. They were found in KGB archives in 1991 and given to the museum. Many certificates were falsified to make it seem as if prisoners died in the town of natural causes. Even a camp execution witnessed by thousands was recorded as a heart attack.

Before June 1942, camp officials scrupulously registered 400,000 prisoners and gave them camp numbers; a few of these number books have survived. About 7,000 prisoner questionnaires, which camp officials used to allocate workers efficiently, have also surfaced.

For purposes of identification, the Nazis took "mug shot"-type photographs of many prisoners from three angles. The museum holds 39,000 such photo sets, mostly of Polish political prisoners but including 1,600 Jewish subjects. Beginning in 1943, the Nazis switched to a system of tattooing numbers on prisoners' left arms.

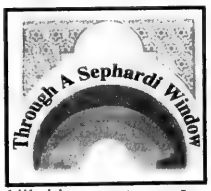
The Germans made lists of prisoners who were too weak to work any more and were dispatched to the gas chambers. On paper, they sometimes referred to the lethal Zyklon B gas pellets as "material for special treatment" or "material for the resettlement of Jews."

Numerous other types of records were among the relatively small quantity that somehow escaped Nazi destruction. Information about former Auschwitz prisoners, if available, may be obtained either in person or by e-mail correspondence. Send e-mails to muzeum@auschwitz.org.pl and put "Archivum" at the top of your request.

On organ donation

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

One of the macabre byproducts of the terrorism of the intifadah and its suicide bombers is its link to organ donations. We have been seeing that the families of the victims of these tragic attacks have been willing to offer the organs of their loved ones to save the lives of individuals urgently awaiting replacements for their own failing organs. No case has caused as much interest as that of Jonathan "Yoni" Jesner.



Yoni, a Jewish Scottish youth studying at a yeshiva in Israel was 19 years old when he was killed by a bomber last month. His family opted to donate his organs in order to save lives. The irony that one of Yoni's vital organs went to save the life of a seven-year-old girl, a Palestinian from east Jerusalem, escaped no one. In fact, this was front-page news virtually around the globe.

Yoni's family cited his commitment to Judaism and his medical aspirations in justifying their decision. "Race, religion, culture and creed," they said, "are not important."

The issue of organ donation has been both a sensitive one and an evolving one. Sensitive, because at first Judaism would have nothing to do with it. It was forbidden, period. Evolving, because the very science of organ transplanting itself was being perfected. As it moved from the realm of theory and experimentation into that of routine life saving, the religious view of it also changed and became more accepting. Halachah – Jewish law – it must be stressed, does not change. Its application, on the other hand, may vary according to the circumstances.

The first and most serious issue our religion had in not sanctioning the donation of organs was the question of harvesting them. Organs are only valuable if they are alive. The problem, then, arises when an organ is taken from an individual – for example, a heart. A heart that must be alive and beating. Is removing this heart from the individual not the same as killing the individual?

The answer to this depends on determination of the time of death of the donor. Is it when the brain and body cease to communicate – when the person is brain dead – or is it when the entire body ceases to function – the individual is no longer breathing? Or is it when the breathing continues, but only artificially with the aid of a respirator? How to determine the exact time of death is a question beyond the scope of this piece.

Essentially there are three other issues that must be considered with regard to organ transplants: One is making use of, or deriving benefit from, a dead person. Another is the duty to bury a loved one – all of a loved one – raising the question of whether organ donation leads to noncompliance with this duty on the part of the family. The final concern is the possible desecration of the human body, an item of holiness.

While all these issues are being hotly debated, individual desperate cases present themselves daily. Sensitivity is being exercised in balancing God's law, the acute need of the recipient whose own time may be running out and the dignity of the donor whose time has come.

Jewish Life

Heading down Judaism's spiritual path

A Book of Life: Embracing Judaism as a Spiritual Practice*, by Rabbi Michael Strassfeld, Schocken Books, 2002, $42.00

Books
Bernard Baskin

About 20 years ago, many Jews – mostly young ones – were strongly influenced by The Jewish Catalogue, an innovative, hands-on guide to Jewish ritual and practice. It became a surprising best-seller. One of its authors was Rabbi Michael Strassfeld, now the leader of the Reconstructionist Society for the Advancement of Judaism in New York City.

A Book of Life is an outstanding and singular achievement. The author is convinced that Judaism is meant to be a spiritual discipline and this comprehensive guide to all aspects of Judaism is enhanced with apt selections from Talmud and midrash, as well as with insights from Chassidic and mystical sources.

The author expounds on the three fundamental pillars upon which the world rests: Torah, prayer and deeds or loving kindness.

In stressing the supremacy of right-eous deeds he writes, "A life of Torah or of prayer is not enough. A life of caring is necessary. Torah can help infuse difficult decisions with wisdom. Prayer can help remind us that we are on a spiritual path and can give us strength to engage in the struggle for justice. However, neither can change the world. Only deeds of loving kindness can help bring about God's vision for the world."

A detailed survey of Shabbat and the holidays, and how they are variously observed by traditional and liberal Jews, is followed by this reference to ecology. "Rabbi Tanhum ben Hiyya taught: The sending of rain is an event greater than the giving of the Torah. The Torah was a joy for Israel only, but rain gives joy to the entire world, including animals and birds – as it is said: "You take care of the earth and irrigate it."

For Rabbi Tanhum, the simple and "natural" phenomenon of rain that constantly recurs is greater than the unique event of the giving of the Torah. Why? Because it affects the whole world, especially birds and animals, who presumably don't benefit from Torah, and also perhaps because rain sustains and gives life to the world.

At the book's end, the author discusses his own approach to God, the validity of scripture and the need for honesty and truth in religious belief. He refers to a daring Talmudic account in which Jeremiah and Daniel deny to God his attributes of "awesomeness" and "might" as established by Moses in the Torah.

Rabbi Strassfeld insists that "In the face of their experience, Jeremiah and Daniel could not resort to the pious descriptions about God. God most of all "wants" truth from us. God wants what we believe, not what we think we should believe.

"Unlike my ancestors who believed with a perfect faith, ani ma'amin be-emunah shevurah, 'I believe with a broken faith' – yet with a belief that somewhere the Heart of the world is waiting for all the holy sparks to find their way home."

The book's conversational tone and openness, its quest for spiritual meaning and its life-wise concerns make it a valuable work.

Children's Jewish books, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Unless you are fortunate to have a wonderful Judaica store in your neighbourhood or a local book fair to celebrate Jewish Book Month, you might never know about all the new and wonderful books being written for young Jewish readers. But if you have access to the Internet, you can track new releases, purchase books online and occasionally sample entire books. Today, a look at Jewish books for children on the Internet.

There are many sites that not only tell you about new releases for kids, but also include mini-reviews. The Internet School Library Media Center has compiled an extensive bibliography reflecting trade books that have been reviewed in "professional reviewing sources." This list is supplemented by online comments that readers have contributed to the Amazon Web site [http://falcon.jmu.edu/~ramseyil/muljewhol.htm].

Since some review sites are produced by publishers or online bookstores, it is in their best interests to rave about their products. That's why I like Wendy Betts' site. Betts is the editor of Notes from the Windowsill, an online book review journal. She emphasizes that her reviews are independent and that she receives no payment from any bookstore or publisher. Here's what Betts says about Janice Cohn's The Christmas Menorahs: How a Town Fought Hate. "An overly didactic but powerful true story about how the people of Billings, Montana, fought hate crimes by putting pictures of menorahs in their windows." You can read dozens more of Betts' mini-reviews of Jewish books at her site [http://deeptht.armory.com/~web/jbooks.html].

I also highly recommend the Jewish Education Center of Cleveland's Web site. The centre has created what it calls "Holiday Helpers." These are very helpful book (and other media) lists that parents and teachers can consult for gift and classroom suggestions. There are lists for the High Holy Days, Sukkot/Simchat Torah and a timely one for Chanukah. In addition, Linda Silver, the centre's librarian, has provided several annotated bibliographies of Jewish children's classics along with annual lists of Notable Children's Books from the Association of Jewish Libraries [http://www.jecc.org/edres/medtech/abv.htm].

Speaking of the Association of Jewish Libraries, do you know a writer who should be honoured for his or her books for Jewish children? The Sydney Taylor Book Award is presented annually "to encourage the publication of outstanding books of positive Jewish content for children." Previous winners include Isaac Bashevis Singer, Marilyn Hirsh and Barbara Cohen. You can find details about this award and the related Sydney Taylor Manuscript Award at the Jewish Libraries' Web site [http://www.jewishlibraries.org/ajlweb/awardsscholarships_files/taylor_book.htm].

It's also not too late to sign up for the Fourth Annual Jewish Book Writers' Conference, being held at Manhattan's 92nd Street Y on Nov. 24. You'll find details at the New England Society of Book Writers and Illustrators Web site [http://nescbwi.org/article.php?sid=110].

Anyone who understands the importance of reading may want to take a page from the book of the Jewish Coalition for Literacy [http://www.jclread.org/bookdrives.htm]. The San Francisco based coalition has organized book drives for Bay Area public elementary schools that don't have libraries or the money to buy new books. During last year's Chanukah Book Drive, the JCL collected almost 1,000 brand new books and over $4,000 in cash donations.

Another book drive is being planned for Chanukah 2002.

Happy reading.

Innovative women's philanthropy launched

Earlier this week an important new UJA Federation program was launched with the intention of making a positive difference in the lives of women.

Chaired by Rhonda Richer and Karen Basian, the Jewish Women's Venture Philanthropy Fund (JWVPF), a Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, is made up of 30 committed, passionate women who, together, will learn about issues close to their hearts before pooling their dollars to help.

"I'm very excited about this initiative being launched," says Basian. "I honestly think we're pioneering a whole new area of philanthropy. The 'venture' aspect of philanthropy is particularly exciting because it focuses on systemic issues which will have long-term benefits for women, young and old."

"I'm exhilarated by the level of interest and concern for women's issues demonstrated by the women I spoke to at the launch," says Richer.

Each JWVPF partner is investing a pre-determined amount in the initiative. Requests for proposals to be funded will be going out to community organizations. The partners will then evaluate submissions based on agreed upon criteria.

While UJA Federation's annual campaign raises funds to support and sustain core services, JWVPF raises "risk capital" to be invested in innovative and cutting-edge initiatives which partners hope will generate a significant "social return on investment."

Calculated risk-taking, an entrepreneurial spirit, and community responsibility are at the heart of this philanthropic endeavour.

She'arim Hebrew Day School grows at BJCC

September 2002 marked the one-year anniversary of a very "moving" experience.

It was one year ago that the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Canada's only day school for Jewish children with learning disabilities – moved into its new home at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre with the generous financial assistance of the Hennich Family.

She'arim students are all smiles at their new home in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Before the move, She'arim, which was established 23 years ago, was housed in Toronto's Beth Emeth Synagogue. Transition to the new headquarters was facilitated by UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative.

Since its move from cramped quarters at Beth Emeth, She'arim's enrollment has risen dramatically, from 70 to 92 students.

"It's been just a total win-win situation for everybody involved – especially the children," says She'arim President Murray Shore. "The school was probably one of the best-kept secrets in Toronto, but now, our exposure is much better and the result has been a 25% enrollment increase already. The children and the teachers are very happy at the BJCC," adds Shore.

"In the other location, we were literally bursting at the seams," says Gerald Goldberg, She'arim's Past President. "The school had one office for the principal and vice-principal, and that office also served as a meeting place, photocopy room and library. The move to the BJCC has worked out very well for everyone involved."

Faigie Davids, She'arim's Executive Director for the past nine years agrees.

"It's been such an upbeat experience moving to the new school," she says. "It's bright, spacious, and overall, just a better environment for the kids to learn in. You look out the windows here, you actually see something. The kids all feel like they're more connected here, that they're part of the bigger picture."

Something old, someone new

This month, Ellen Scheinberg, a 38-year-old Montreal native was named as its new Director, replacing Dr. Steve Speisman, who is now the Executive Director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park.

The fact that Scheinberg chose this particular line of work as a career is really no surprise.

"History is our family business," says Scheinberg. "My father is a history professor at Concordia University and my brother is a high school history teacher in Hull, Quebec. Ever since I was young, I've had an interest in history."

Ellen Scheinberg

Graduating with a BA and an MA in history from Queen's University in Kingston, Scheinberg began a stint with Ottawa's National Archives where she worked as the archivist for 10 years.

She was also involved in several prominent committees and has published several articles on archives and women's history.

Two years ago, Scheinberg moved to Toronto with her husband, Jack and son, Cory, now three-years-old.

Her first Toronto position was with the Ontario government, but when she found out about the opportunity at the Ontario Jewish Archives on the Internet, she knew she had found her match.

"I thought it would be a good position for me based on my background and experience," she says.

"My primary purpose here is to try to create a new environment that is modern and updated. I think with some renovation of the facilities and digitization of our collections, the Archives can be much more user-friendly and accessible to people who may not really know about us. Ultimately by putting some of our rich holdings on-line, I'm hoping that people will be able to view our records from the comfort of their own homes."

An avid runner, Scheinberg says she has little time to take to the streets of Toronto these days because her spare time is limited. For good reason. Aside from putting in long hours at the Archives, Scheinberg has spent the past five years working on her Ph.D. in – what else – history, focusing on women and immigration.

"The Archives hold a wealth of information and treasures about the history of Ontario's Jewish community," she says. "I'm excited about the possibilities here. Part of what appealed to me about this job was the opportunity to meet new people and get involved in Toronto's Jewish community."

Canadian funds help save Israeli lives

Canadian Jewry is playing a vital role in assisting Israeli hospitals through contributions raised during UJA/CJA Israel Emergency Campaigns.

Israel's health system is hard-pressed to respond to the need for more equipment and supplies.

Nearly $6.5 million has been contributed by donors throughout Canada.

"The Jewish communities of Canada have responded..."

"The Jewish communities of Canada have responded speedily and generously to Israel's urgent medical needs," says Howard Weisband, Director-General of the UIA Federations Canada office in Israel. "Raising funds for the purchase of state-of-the-art equipment saves and sustains the lives of thousands of innocent terror victims."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has already allocated more than $1.7 million to Israeli hospitals for the purchase of emergency and trauma equipment from Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. The funds are being dispersed to several hospitals in Eilat, Haifa, Jerusalem, Netanya, Tel Aviv, Tiberias, Hadera, Afula, and Safed, and to organizations dealing with trauma.

Israel's medical needs are prioritized by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), Toronto's overseas partner, after consultation with Israel's Ministry of Health, to ensure that allocations correspond to national health policies.

"Israel's medical needs are prioritized..."

CHAT Richmond Hill thriving three years later

What began in a cloud of controversy three years ago has become a first-class addition to Toronto's Jewish education system.

After an initial enrollment of 180, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) campus in Richmond Hill today boasts close to 500 students from grades 9 to 11.

In June 2000, CHAT opened its Richmond Hill campus for grade 9 students in order to ease overcrowding on the Wilmington campus. Many parents were very concerned.

"Now, looking back at the establishment of the Richmond Hill campus, I want to pay particular credit to those students (now in grade 11) who pioneered the new school," says Paul Shaviv, who is now CHAT's Director of Education. "I also want to credit their parents who, after their initial surprise, shock, and even anger, quickly pulled together as partners in this exciting move for CHAT and for the entire Jewish community of Toronto."

Today those same students look back at the experience with pride. They were, in retrospect, pioneers.

"I think there was a natural and understandable concern on behalf of the parents, especially with the lateness of the announcement three years ago," says Gary Levine, Principal, Richmond Hill campus.

"There is a real sense of involvement and cooperation by the parents of our students. They've been very happy with the progression here. After all, in the end, we were still CHAT. Maybe we were technically a new school three years ago, but we still had the CHAT template in place and we knew what was expected of us."

CHAT students surf the web

Shaviv says that he is working hard with CHAT leadership and UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) to ensure that by September, 2005 CHAT Richmond Hill will move to a new state-of-the-art building on JTT's Vaughan Campus.

Lunching with Lions

UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy held its annual Lion of Judah Luncheon, "Hats and High Tea" last week at the Four Seasons Hotel. The event was a huge success with more than 200 women in attendance, making it the largest lunch yet. A "Lion of Judah" designation is awarded to women who make a minimum annual contribution of $5,000 to the UJA Federation campaign. There are currently 456 Toronto Lions, including 76 new members since April. The event, chaired by Sarena Koschitzky and Ray Rubin was highlighted by Captain Sharon Feingold, a spokesperson for the Israel Defence Forces, as keynote speaker. Captain Feingold, who is responsibile for formulating media and public relations policies, has appeared on CNN, Fox News, and CBC. The event also featured a medley from the hit musical "Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh." Women's Campaign & Advocacy recently surpassed the $6 million mark in funds raised for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. To this point, the Campaign is closing in on $58 million.

Kelman family pay tribute to their mother

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As a tribute to the memory of Rebbitzen Mirl Fish Kelman, her children recently published a book, Mother's Memoir and Family Recollections, in which they describe her influence on the Toronto Jewish community and tell how she overcame adversity and raised a family of communal leaders.

The life of the matriarch of the Kelman family reflects the history of the first generation of Canadians who fled from persecution and struggled to establish a loving family and a traditional home. It is also the story of a woman who reached out to help friends and strangers in need.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and one of the children of Rabbi Zvi Yehuda and Mirl Fish Kelman, told The CJN the book was published because "we thought that it was important for our children and grandchildren and for generations to come to know what an outstanding woman and role model our mother was."

The book, written as a joint venture by Mirl Kelman's four surviving children, records their memories of their mother and their life in Toronto. These recollections, Rabbi Kelman said, paint a picture of their mother as "a baalat chesed with exceedingly fine midos – a woman who was an extraordinarily selfless person and engaged constantly in the pursuit of noble goals."

The book is based in part on Mirl Kelman's diary, which was written in Yiddish and translated into English. It records the first 18 years of her life in Galicia, her family's travels and her life in Vienna up to her marriage.

In the preface, her children write that they regret that she recorded only her early years. "But even from her short Yiddish memoir, we get a clear picture of her eloquence and abilities."

Mirl Fish was born in 1900 in Linsk, Galicia, when it was part of the Austrian Empire. After the outbreak of the war in 1914, the country was overrun by the Russians. The Fish family fled the Cossacks and finally settled in Vienna.

Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kelman was born in 1896 in Wishnovchik, Galicia. His family was also forced to join the exodus and also settled in Vienna. In 1918, Mirl married Rabbi Zvi Kelman in Vienna in an arranged marriage.

In 1928, he came to Canada, where he taught and served as rabbi for several congregations. In 1930, he brought his wife and five children – Abraham, Wolfe, Celia (Silber), Joseph and Tobie (Silverman) – to Toronto. A sixth child, Claire (Goldstein), was born in Toronto.

Mirl Fish Kelman

When her husband died in 1936, she continued, despite hardship, to open her home and heart to young students, soldiers and the needy.

She became a surrogate mother for many boys who had been interned in Canada and were studying at a yeshiva across the street.

In addition to the story of the rebbitzen's life, the 93-page book also contains the Kelman family tree, letters and other documents, photographs, and tributes by community leaders and journalists.

Also included is an account of the Kelman family reunion in 1999, which took place in Stamford, Conn., and was attended by 185 descendants.

Despite the hardships that their mother faced, her children recall in the book that she played a vital role in the development of the Toronto Jewish community. She organized and served as the first president of Mizrachi Women in the city and was a founder of the Shomer Shabbos Organization. She regularly organized oneg Shabbat gatherings.

"Our home became an institution," Rabbi Kelman said.

Mirl Kelman was determined to bring the Shabbat message to the community. She spearheaded a campaign that included marches to Kensington Market and distributed leaflets and published advertisements in the local Jewish paper explaining the sanctity and central role of Shabbat.

One result of her campaign was that some bakeries and grocery stores began to close on Saturday.

Mirl Kelman died in 1983 at the age of 83.

All of her children are involved in Jewish communal service, and this is continuing into the next generation.

"I believe that her 20 grandchildren, 79 great-grandchildren and 22 great-great-grandchildren are influenced by my mother," Rabbi Kelman said. "Her extraordinary traits left their mark on all of us, for which we are indeed most grateful."

The book, published with the help of the Reporter, the weekly Jewish newspaper of Binghamton, N.Y., is available at the Jewish Book Fair and at Judaica stores.

University students learn to advocate for Israel

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

Participating in the Jewish Campus Services' Israel advocacy retreat were, from left, York University students Michael Ferman, Jesse Paikin and Rina Goldberg; Carleton University student Eric Lowenstein; and York student Hilary Edelstein.

A recent Israel advocacy weekend gave students across Ontario the tools they need to continue promoting Israel on campus as the intifadah rages on, its organizers say.

"The goal of the retreat was to educate students about Israel and provide them with the tools and skills necessary to represent Israel on campus while being able to effectively and proactively combat anti-Israel sentiment and anti-Semitism that exists," said Jordana Ballas, Israel affairs co-ordinator at Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), which sponsored the second annual Israel advocacy retreat in Niagara Falls, Ont., earlier this month.

Since the event, which was attended by one hundred and twenty-five students, the JSF: the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University has set up a table with petitions and information about Israeli soldiers missing in action.

Ballas organized the weekend retreat as a joint initiative between JCS, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS), the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Agency.

Leadership training sessions led by Neil Lazarus, a Middle East and Israel advocacy expert, and Mike Schneider of Rhino International, a training and development company that works with university students, "taught us about establishing relationships with other on-campus organizations that have no particular stance on Israel and finding our similarities with them in order to reach out and educate them about Israel, especially the cultural side, through joint programming," said Bram Bregman, a 21-year-old engineering student at the University of Toronto.

Lazarus provided students with debating tips, such as relaying details and personal accounts instead of facts, numbers and clichés. He also taught the students to use "pre-packaged advocacy" – prepared messages – and to speak the language of the people they are trying to reach by relating the topic of Israel to their own experiences.

Lazarus suggested using a key phrase, what he called the "emergency exit," when confronted by people with an anti-Israel bias: "Yes, but you need to remember that's not the issue, the issue is…"

Daniel Held, JSF's Israel affairs co-ordinator, spoke following a group of young Israelis.

"By understanding what our peers in Israel are going through each day, we are better equipped to advocate on their behalf," Held said. "On campus we are fighting for the right of Israeli students to study and live in peace, to attend classes without the threat of violence and terror, and to enjoy a free life just as we do here in Canada."

The students participated in brainstorming sessions to come up with ways to advocate for Israel successfully and to bring the skills they were learning back to their schools.

On Sunday morning, the students participated in a closing session with Lazarus that explored the connections of Israel advocacy with Jewish identity and continuity and the importance of Israel in tying Jews with their past, present and future.

"After participating in this retreat, I have come to appreciate the common bond that Jewish students from all over the world share," said Eric Lowenstein, a 21-year-old Australian exchange student at Carleton University in Ottawa.

Karen Beniluz, a first-year student at York University, expressed a similar sentiment. "I would not have been nearly as prepared as I am now to stand up for Israel if I hadn't attended the advocacy retreat," she said.

Jared Sarfin, a third-year student at York University's Schulich School of Business, said the "content of what we learned at the retreat was far better than any media source, including those from Israel, could provide."

"Not only were the skills obtained a critical aspect of the retreat, but the connections formed with Jews on our campus as well as various campuses across the province provide us with a strong network of support," said Jesse Paikin, a 19-year-old psychology student at York.

JCS, which is planning a follow-up, week-long "Israel Fest" in late January to be organized by Jewish students and held simultaneously at university campuses across Ontario, hopes to continue holding such retreats "for years to come," Ballas said.

"This retreat is only a kick-off to a variety of other programs to be held in Israel, Ottawa and across university campuses over the course of the year that will build on the theme of Israel advocacy, awareness and education," she said.

Shira Zeliger, who participated in the retreat, is a first-year student at York University in Toronto and serves on JSF's Israel Affairs Committee.

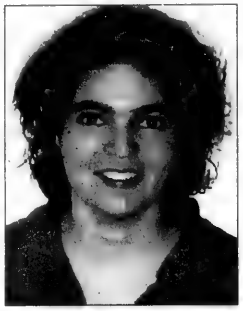
Two Canadians among this year's Wexner fellows

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Yael Ben-Dat and Tali Hyman complete their graduate studies in Jewish Education, they will be alumnae not only of their respective institutions but of the fifteenth "class" of graduate fellows of the Wexner Foundation.

The Ohio-based foundation funds Jewish men and women pursuing full-time graduate studies leading to careers in professional Jewish leadership. Tuition and a living stipend are granted for two years and may be renewed for up to two additional years.



Tali Hyman

Although this year's fellows are spread out from New York to L.A., they meet twice yearly, along with all current Wexner fellows (their own class and the three ahead of them). They also connect online weekly with their own class to share divrei Torah and any Jewish issues that may be on their minds.

"It's lovely," said Ben-Dat. "We have a very nice constant building and growing together. [The Wexner fellows constitute] a pluralistic, very open, stimulating and exciting community."

Ben-Dat, 23, who along with Hyman is one of two Canadians in this year's Wexner class, is working on a Master's degree in general and special education at the Bank Street College of Education in New York. She hopes to pursue a second Master's in Jewish Education and eventually combine the two fields.

An alumna of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Ben-Dat (daughter of CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat) said her first exposure to special education within the Jewish community was at Camp Ramah.

"Working in Ramah's Tikvah program gave me insight [and taught me that] all people regardless of disability are capable of developing strong, beautiful Jewish identities... The primary way of doing that is through the Jewish educational system."

After completing a B.Sc. in Psychology with a second major in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto in 2001, Ben-Dat spent a year teaching Hebrew and Judaic Studies to special needs students at the Solomon Schechter Day School of Westchester.

"Ultimately my goal is to make Jewish education available to more people," she said.

Hyman, who was born in Calgary and raised in Vancouver, was ordained from Hebrew Union College - Jewish Institute of Religion in Los Angeles earlier this year. She is working on a PhD in Jewish Education at New York University's Steinhardt School of Education.

Although she hasn't ruled out the possibility of congregational work, she is leaning toward teaching Jewish Education at a seminary or other institution. "We need lots of interesting, passionate Jewish professionals working from all different angles," she said.

Yael Ben-Dat

Hyman, 28, whose parents are in business together as publishers of government directories, comes from "a very long line of non-rabbis." In fact, until her second year at the University of British Columbia, where she received a BA in Sociology, she thought she was headed for law school.

A conversation with a social work student doing a clinical practicum eventually steered her in a different direction. "Tali," she said. "It's so interesting that you're teaching religious school and leading junior congregation services, and that you're vice-president of Hillel. Have you ever considered rabbinical school?"

"I laughed," recalled Hyman. "It was like someone saying, 'Don't you think you should be a national league football player?' ...[Then] it struck me that she was suggesting I make a profession out of my identity."

The thought was scary, she recalls, but she couldn't get it out of her mind. It "percolated" for months before she decided that it was the path she wanted to pursue.

Hyman's background in education dates back at least to 1995, when her rabbi asked her to become involved in a new pluralistic Jewish high school program in Vancouver (TAG, the acronym for Torah Avodah Gemilut Hasadim), for which she became the founding assistant director.

When she was a student at Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles, a semester course called Introduction to Jewish Education whetted her appetite to continue in that direction.

Before rabbinical school, she didn't know what her options were in the field of Jewish Education. "That is one of the problems in recruitment," she said. "When you think of Jewish professional life, you generally think, 'Rabbi.' There's a lot of prestige bound up in the title. Education doesn't have the [same] institutional history."

Two Years after the Reckoning

Reinventing the future of the Middle East

Two years ago, Yasser Arafat rejected Palestinian statehood, including East Jerusalem as its capital, and walked out of the Camp David talks, starting the second Intifada against Israel. Everything changed as violence erupted. George Will is one of four outstanding analysts at Holy Blossom this fall who will address the current situation.

MINI-SCHOOL CONFERENCE: Florence Melton (left), founder of the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School, is seen with Loretta Tanenbaum, director of Toronto's Florence Melton Adult Mini-School (FMAMS) at the annual international FMAMS Directors Conference, held this year in Chicago. The conference's theme was Educational Leadership: Fulfilling our Mission. Representatives from North America, Israel, Australia and the United Kingdom shared information about the FMAMS, a project of the Hebrew University that today operates in 63 different sites with over 5,500 students worldwide. This is an international network of community-based schools that give adults the opportunity to acquire Jewish literacy in an open, trans-denominational and intellectually stimulating learning environment. The school is in its second year in Toronto, with a total enrolment of about 60 students. For information on the school, call Tanenbaum at 416-789-7400.

lances in the disputed territories of Gaza, eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank "does not violate any Canadian policy, because such a policy doesn't exist," said Bitton.

"All the judges agreed that 'there is no Canadian policy expressed in the Act of Parliament or in any publicly available government document that a Canadian charitable organization cannot operate in the occupied territories.'

"However, by a majority of 2 to 1, the Court upheld the proposed revocation of our registration as a charitable organization based on the absence of evidence demonstrating that CMDA maintained control over the use of ambulances and related equipment it provided to MDA."

The dissenting judge found two "reasoning flaws" made by the minister of national revenue, on which the decision to revoke was based: irrelevant considerations and breaches of procedural fairness.

"In his opinion, without those two flaws, the minister would not have considered the gifting issue to be sufficiently important to revoke CMDA's charitable status," Bitton said.

Na'amat Israel president to fight for women's rights

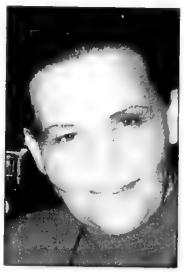
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Talia Livny, the newly elected president of Na'amat Israel, plans to spend much of her five-year term attempting to eliminate "dangerous gaps" in Israeli society.

The 59-year old lawyer, who has worked as deputy adviser to the Minister of Defence, legal adviser of Histadrut, Israel's national labour union, and as a shlichah for the Zionist Federation in New York, says that in the last 20 years, these gaps have become widespread.

"There are gaps between the religious and non-religious, between varying political groups, and between the rich and the poor," she says.

In Toronto recently for Na'amat Canada's 13th triennial convention, her first official visit to the Diaspora, Livny says that a gap of which she is seriously concerned is the 40 per cent wage difference between men and women.



Tal Livny

"We have to find ways to make changes that will help women find not only jobs, but careers, and to have the same promotional opportunities as men."

It is also important for the women's labour force to "raise its voice," she says.

Livny, a divorced mother of two children, says she plans to organize workplace sessions to encourage women to become active in trade unions.

"I believe that when women get together they can make an impact," she says. "I want them to get involved in collective agreements and be part of the decision-making process."

She is very distressed about the cutbacks the government is planning in 2003.

"As things are now, single mothers with children under age seven get a type of insured income," she says. "The government intends to cut that income, however, by about one-third. That should put another one million women and children under the poverty line."

The government also plans to change the amount of time workers need to be on the job in order to collect unemployment insurance, from eight months to one full year, she says.

"Women are heavily affected by that because many of them work in schools or day-care centres that are only open eight months of the year."

Na'amat is expecting thousands of women to participate in a rally to protest these cutbacks on Oct. 29 in Tel Aviv, she says.

"There are other ways to cut expenses that would not affect the delicate structure of Israeli society, and I have confidence we can put a stop to these changes; they are absurd."

Taking on the presidency of Na'amat is something to which she intends to devote "250 per cent of her time," she says.

"We have 5,000 people, mainly women, who work in day-care centres, technical high schools, and centres for women's rights which offer legal advice related to the workforce or family as well as in rabbinical courts, if necessary.

"The organization has led a big fight in order to guarantee the nomination of rabbis in these courts who support women and are sensitive to our problems. We have seen cases in which battered women are convinced to return home," she says.

"We are trying to shout it out – to make all kinds of protests, that women have options and do not have to return to an abusive home."

She is attending the convention, she says, because "I know Canadian members of Na'amat are very warm and devoted, and sponsor about 25 facilities across the country.

"I feel we are united, and at this time especially, the ties between Israel and the Dispora are more important than ever. Israel can be strengthened by the Diaspora, and the Dispora can be strengthened by a strong and just Israel."

Diaspora Jews must support Israel: CIC leader

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Too many Jews in the Diaspora lack the confidence to stand up for Israel, says Marra Messinger, director of community development at the Canada-Israel Committee.

"The conflict is being fought in Israel as well as in the international community, and it is manifested in the court of public opinion. Israel desperately needs help fighting that battle," she said at a panel at Na'amat Canada's recent 13th triennial convention.

Also on the panel was Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and moderator Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The Canadian Jewish News.

It is vital for Jews to advocate on Israel's behalf, said Messinger.

But some people may think it's not "cool" to be associated with the cause, others may not want to make waves and still others may not know how to answer anti-Semitic rhetoric, she said.

"You don't have to be an encyclopedia in order to be an advocate. Do you think Palestinians or Arab supporters know every fact?

"Look at the Palestinian public relations campaign. They repeat their slogans over and over and over. We don't have to become propagandists, but we must [learn] to promote our agenda rather than defend it. Our message has to get out, and it does not have to be complicated."

Na'amat holds convention

Criticism of Israel is not necessarily anti-Semitic, Ben-Dat said. "We can define Israel's enemies as most of the Arab world and anyone who believes Israel should not exist as a Jewish State.

"Any coverage that assists in that fact is anti-Zionist, but we have to be careful when we point our finger. We cannot just say it is anti-Semitic; it depends on the context."

Ben-Dat said we have the right to question a story if it alleges that Jews control the military and the media or oppress the Palestinians or if it promotes Holocaust denial.

Farber agreed that there is a fine line between a concerned critic of Israel and an Israel hater. "Is a critic prepared to admit that Israel is the only democracy in the area? If not, he is an Israel hater."

We need to acknowledge that anti-Semitism is erupting, Farber said. "We have seen trade unions adopt nasty resolutions about Israel with no talk of the suicide bombers, and we have seen an OISE professor circulating a petition denouncing Israel. That is nothing short of outrageous."

He said he has no problem receiving disturbing anti-Israel or anti-Semitic e-mails because they help him formulate ideas.

"Many people do not know about how venomous attacks on Israel [can be]. It is important to know who our enemies are in order to respond."

In other Na'amat business, Anita Blanshay of Montreal was installed as president, Na'amat Canada, for a three-year term.

Blanshay is the third member of her family to head the organization. Her mother-in-law was the first national president after the organization's separation from the United States, and her sister-in-law held the position 12 years ago.

Her late daughter, Rhodie Blanshay Benaroch, was an active member of the organization before she died suddenly about 1½ years ago, said Blanshay.

"In my term, I would like to see more young women become involved in Na'amat, and take part in leadership seminars to Israel.

"I want them to see firsthand where their fund-raising dollars are going," she said.

Her daughter had helped raise money for a playground at a woman's centre, said Blanshay, and they have now dedicated a room in that centre to her.

Student enrolment up at BGU

The 2002-2003 academic year at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev opened with an overall increase in the number of students enrolled in both undergraduate and graduate programs.

Sixteen thousand students enrolled this year compared to 14,000 last year, with a 45 per cent increase in the number of graduate applications, making admission more competitive.

The significant increase in the number of students interested in BGU only proves "that we have a fantastic product – an excellent academic institution with wonderful students and a dedicated academic and administrative staff," says university president Prof. Avishay Braverman.

Three new academic programs are being launched this year. The department of Middle East studies is opening a new master's program. The faculty of engineering sciences is offering a bachelor's degree in structural engineering, making BGU the first in the county to confer an academic degree in this field. Students will also be able to earn an MA in an interdisciplinary program in Jewish studies under the auspices of the faculty of humanities and social sciences.

Chrétien assailed for performance in Beirut

Call violence by one name or another, for me it's violence."

The motion passed by CJC said it was "particularly dismayed" by Canada's failure to properly respond to Lahoud.

When CJC passes a motion, it becomes official organization policy and is communicated to the Prime Minister's Office (PMO), Silverstone said, adding that the communication of this motion was still in process.

PMO spokesperson Thoren Hudyma did not return a call to The CJN, but she reportedly has stated that Chrétien was "not aware" of Nasrallah's presence, and that the Canadian government was "not in a position to be vetting invitees or guests of the host government."

Landy said it would have been "inappropriate" for Chrétien to have left the proceedings while Nasrallah sat among the first-row dignitaries.

But Chrétien should have known Nasrallah would be there in the first place, Landy said.

"A little forward-thinking by the government would have avoided the problem."

In an Oct. 19 National Post report, Landy said the government should have protested Nasrallah's attendance at the summit in advance.

Landy said such foresight prevented the recent United Nations World Summit on Sustainable Development in Johannesburg, South Africa, from "turning into a Durban," a reference to the anti-Israel tone that pervaded the UN World Conference Against Racism September 2001.

"Advance lobbying by us prevented Israel-bashing" from taking place in Johannesburg, he said.

But past CJC president Moshe Ronen said that what happened in Beirut was the "Durbanization" of the Francophonie summit and Canada must account for its "total ineffectiveness" at the conference.

Prior to the vote on the motion, Ronen said Canada "failed the test" with regard to Middle East policy.

The prime minister's performance was not just another gaffe or blunder, but a "reflection of Canadian policy," executive member Manuel Prutschi said.

Also at issue before the meeting was Chrétien's refusal to condemn the ouster of French-Jewish journalist Gideon Koutz from the summit for having filed a report to Israel. Koutz is a correspondent for one of France's best-known monthly Jewish publications, L'Arche.

It was shameful, one executive member said, for Chrétien to say that it was up to France to respond to Koutz's removal, not Canada.

Dorothy Zalcman Howard, CJC's national executive committee chair, also noted that Israel continues to be "systematically excluded" from the Francophonie group of nations.

Other delegates to the Francophonie summit were accompanied by translators since their countries have no true francophone ties, yet "Israel is still not in," Zalcman Howard said. (Israel has one million French-speaking citizens.)

In other Israel-related business, the meeting was told that media mogul Israel (Izzy) Asper will be among several prominent Jewish Canadians overseeing a new "cabinet" to advocate for Israel.

Because Israel advocacy competes with many other community projects for funding, the CIC and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) will work together on the new advocacy project.

Landy also told the meeting that continued funding of the Quebec regional branch of the Canada-Israel Committee lobby group is currently "being discussed" within the Jewish community. He did not elaborate.

Jewish leaders blast union call for Israeli boycott

"How, in good conscience, can a major Quebec public figure use such absurdly inaccurate and inflammatory language?" the statement read. "It is unworthy of our own standards of fairness and equity in Quebec, and it is deeply unworthy of a major union, which claims to defend the rights and privileges of tens of thousands of Quebecers."

Among those at the press conference were Steven Cummings, FEDERATION CJA president; Thomas Hecht, president of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region; Casper Bloom, acting community relations chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region; and David Bensoussan, a Communauté Sépharade du Québec vice-president.

Hecht called the boycott part of the "collective [international] attempt to delegitimize the Jewish people," but Cummings stated emphatically that the Jewish community is not accusing the CSQ of anti-Semitism.

From Oct. 6 to 18, the CSQ and the coalition organized a tour of Israel and the disputed territories for 10 people who represent Quebec "civil society."

Besides Richard, the tour's participants included François Crépeau, a Université de Montréal international law professor; Elaheh Machouf, of the Fédération des femmes du Québec; Benjamin Desautels, of the Fédération étudiante collégiale du Québec; Paul Lévesque, of Médecins pour une justice sociale; Gervais L'Heureux, president of the Association québécoise des organisations de coopération internationale; and Robert Silverman, a member of the Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation.

The group visited Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva, Hebron, Jenin, Bethlehem, Gaza and Ramallah, where they met Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, and consulted with Palestinian and Israeli organizations, international rights groups and other NGOs.

In its preliminary report, the delegation denounced the "humiliation and suffering" of the Palestinians due to Israeli "repression." It described harsh restrictions on movement, arbitrary curfews and detentions, rude soldiers and settlers, land confiscation, destruction of homes, lack of basic services such as water, electricity and sewage, collective punishment and blocked or vandalized Red Crescent ambulances.

Though it called for Canada to exert pressure on Israel to respect international law, it did not mention a boycott.

The coalition says its final report, which is to be issued in a month and will also include photos, will be submitted to the House of Commons foreign affairs committee.

CSQ represents 145,000 members, of whom 100,000 work in education and most of the remainder elsewhere in the public sector.

The Jewish leaders denounced the report as "blatantly one-sided" and criticized its authors for "falsely and maliciously portray[ing]... Israel as a rogue state unworthy of its legitimate place amongst the family of nations."

They criticized the delegation for ignoring the daily threat Israelis live under while maintaining an open, democratic society, and argued that the Palestinians' hardship is due to "the tragic corruption and oppression imposed by the Palestinian leadership."

The delegation, they noted, did not meet with any Israeli officials.

Silverman, who attended the press conference as a representative of McGill's CKUT radio station, said the delegation had plans to meet with the president of the Histadrut, Israel's labour federation, but the federation cancelled the meeting the night before.

But attaché de presse Annie Myara said that the Israeli Consulate in Montreal had arranged the meeting with the Histadrut before the trip and that it was the delegation that changed the plans. She said Consul General Shlomo Avital was hoping to meet with Richard this week.

Sandra Winston, the Montreal representative of the Israel Trade Commission, said she doubts a boycott would have any significant effect.

"The people who might be interested are not buying Israeli products anyway," she said.

The total value of Quebec's imports from Israel in 2001 was $186.4 million, mainly from the industrial, high-tech and medical sectors, Winston said.

But Richard's urge for a boycott drew criticism from D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman. "[It's] bigotry, pure and simple. Her call for a boycott could only generate intolerance."

The CSQ, formerly known as the CEQ, has supported the Palestinians for at least 30 years, as has another large federation, the Confederation des syndicats nationaux. Last March, the latter's president Marc Laviolette called Israel "a terrorist state" and compared Ariel Sharon to Slobadan Milosevic and other "gruesome personalities."

Concordia moratorium eased

MONTREAL – Concordia University's board of governors has eased somewhat the moratorium imposed Sept. 9 following a violent demonstration against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The board lifted the ban on all information tables in the mezzanine of the Henry F. Hall Building, except for those related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But no information tables are allowed in the building's lobby.

The board, which is the university's highest decision-making body, said it came to the unanimous decision Oct. 21 at a special meeting, acting upon the recommendations of Rector Frederick Lowy.

In another unanimous decision, the board established a review committee to look at possible revisions of the university's Code of Rights and Responsibilities.

"Concordia security continues to examine the tapes of the event to identify those responsible for the violence, and the university is taking action under the existing Code," the board said in a statement.

Pending the committee's report, the disciplinary powers given to Lowy by the board on Sept. 9 will remain in effect. Those powers include taking immediate action against violators of the moratorium. Sanctions can range from a written reprimand to fines of up to $500 to expulsion. Temporary suspension can be extended for a fixed period of time if there is non-compliance.

The board says it is also encouraging ongoing discussions between the administration and student leaders on the Israeli-Palestinian issue, and dialogue between the principal student groups involved in the Middle East debate.

"With today's actions, the board recognized the positive steps that have already been taken to lower the level of tension on campus," the statement said. "Based on these steps towards mutual understanding, the board will evaluate the suitability of progressively easing the conditions of the resolutions passed on Sept. 18 [which detailed what was banned under the moratorium and the sanctions for violation].

"Until that time, the cooling-off provisions set out by the board remain in place."

"אינני יהודי ואף אחד במשפחתי לא נהרג במלחמה. עבורי אנטישמיות היתה דבר שאינו עולה על הדראר שלי. אני עובד וגר במינכן, מקום שכל פינה וחיוב קשורים בהיטלר. האנשים מנומסים מאוד ואדיבים, ממש שיא התרבות. זה התחיל בדברים קטנים. אני נוסע לעבודה באוטובוס ורואה ילד של בית ספר תיכון מעביר לחברו את "מיין קאמפף" של היטלר, וחבר אומר לו שוה "קוואל". כעבור חודש, בפגישה עסקית עם ארבעה אנשים צעירים בעלי השכלה גבוהה, מתנהלת שיחה מנומסת ורכה. עד אשר מוזכרים עיסקה עם איש עסקים מניו יורק שעונה לשם רובינשטיין. חנחזים שלהם מתרחבים, טון השיחה עולה, ואחד מהם אומר: "כן, וכל מה שאכפת ליהודים זה כסף".

Jordanian prince brings message of peace

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Prince Hassan of Jordan stressed the need for security for Israel and justice for the Palestinians in order to achieve a lasting peace during a visit here earlier this month.

The Cambridge-educated younger brother of the late King Hussein was the inaugural speaker in the Arthur V. Mauro Centre for Peace and Justice's new Sol Kanee lecture series.

Hassan began his Oct. 9 lecture at the University of Manitoba's St. Paul College by calling for a moment of silence in tribute to all victims of "senseless" violence in the Middle East over the past half century.

"I am in the business of promoting the noble art of conversation," he said.

He noted that there are many people in different parts of the world who are not as fortunate as Canadians to have control over their own lives.

In discussing the looming American conflict with Iraq, Hassan took hope from U.S. President George W. Bush's statement that war would be a last resort.

In addressing the Israeli-Palestinian issue, he noted that two years ago he was invited to visit Auschwitz.

"People in my part of the world thought I was touched in the head," he recalled, "but I felt it was necessary for me to go. I feel a certain degree of hope that over time Israeli Jews and Palestinian Arabs will come to internalize each other's suffering. Bridges of trust that were broken can be rebuilt."

Hassan spoke of the need for more dialogue in this post-Sept. 11 world. As an example, he cited a conference he attended in Germany two years ago with participants from Israel, Turkey, Libya, Egypt and some western countries.

"The conference took place in an atmosphere of academic objectivity," he said. "We need to encourage more communications between peoples. It helps humanize the conversation."

Hassan also spoke of a new initiative, the Parliament of Cultures based in Istanbul, that hopes to bring together youth from the West and the Middle East.

"I have been asked what I think of Osama Bin Laden," he said. "I say that it is not for me to judge him. That is for God. Hundreds of Muslims also died on 9/11."

He noted that many Muslims feel that the world is ignoring their plight. "Seventy per cent of the world's refugees are Muslim," he pointed out, adding that the Arab world should be spending more money on education and less on weapons. "Our own governments' mismanagement, however, is one reason for Islamic extremism."

While America and the West are concerned about security, Hassan observed that the most effective way to deal with the roots of terrorism is by reaching out to the other side and trying to establish a dialogue.

He called for an Arabian version of the Marshall Plan, the Allied effort that was instrumental in rebuilding western Europe after World War II.

"In 1994, at a meeting of Middle Eastern and North African leaders in Casablanca, we proposed a $35 million investment in infrastructure in our part of the world to provide clean drinking water and improved roads," he said.

"We approached the European Union and were turned back. A stable peace in our region requires economic well-being and an intrain-dependence where each side recognizes and respects the other's identity."

In response to a question from a Jewish student, Hassan stated that Jordan has no designs on the West Bank or Jerusalem.

"There is an enormous amount of work to be done," Hassan replied.

"Right now we have a leadership vacuum in our part of the world. It can be filled by people of goodwill who want to better society or left to sloganeers to fill. All religions have blots on their history. The biggest impediment to conversation is a tendency for people to religious and cultural self-righteousness where they pass off their own suffering as more sacred than the other's."

The Kanee lecture series is funded by a major grant from the Winnipeg-based Richardson Foundation and named in honour of Jewish leader Sol Kanee. Kanee, who was present for the speech, is a past chair of the University of Manitoba's board of governors.

CAMP DIRECTOR OPPORTUNITY ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE MUSKOKA

Since its inception in 1948, CAMP SHALOM has prided itself with its heritage, traditions and loyal campers. As our camp director, you would have the opportunity to put your "hands on" management skills and your commitment to Zionist and Judaic principles to work in our well-organized, fun environment.

You are a committed team player who leads by example. You like to get involved in day and night camp activities with staff and campers. Previous camp experience in a leadership capacity is a must. Previous experience in a leadership role at Camp Shalom, or one of our affiliated camps, is valuable.

Working closely with our Executive Director and Board of Directors, you will utilize your strong organizing, planning and recruiting skills to help prepare for the upcoming season. Your challenge will involve part-time hours throughout the Fall and Winter season and will increase in June through August when we are in full operation.

Send detailed résumé describing your experience to:

CJA campaign off to good start

As of Oct. 11, the amount of money pledged was $1,565,000 – almost 40 per cent of this year's target of $4 million, and $158,000 more than last year at this point in the campaign.

CJA campaign director Gerry Koffman, says that is up over nine per cent, card for card, and has reached over $480,000 – 60 per cent of its goal.

"Altogether, we have processed 2,266 cards including 99 new gifts," he says.

"Some of them are from people who are new to the community, while others are from people who have not contributed in years. For a city our size, it is a wonderful campaign."

One matter that is raising concern among some Federation/CJA board members, however, is that a large percentage of the money is being earmarked for Israel and overseas rather than local needs.

Winnipeg is the only Jewish community in North America with a two-line card, which allows donors to choose where they want their money allotted.

Thus far in this campaign, 67 per cent of the money has been designated for the local community and 34 per cent for Israel and overseas, as compared to 70 per cent and 30 per cent last year. In addition to the monies directed to Israel this fall, the community raised $1,235,000 for Israel in the emergency campaign in the spring.

At the same time, local Jewish fund-raising needs are growing as the Federation/CJA has taken on some new beneficiaries, and added a major new program to try to increase the size of the Jewish population here.

In other communities, the funding raised in CJA campaigns is split 50-50 between local and Israel/overseas needs, Koffman says, and when the campaign falls short, the larger amount stays in the community.

"Different views were expressed at our Sept.30 board meeting about what to do about the two-line card system," Koffman adds, "But no decisions were made."

Among the suggestions, were moving to a one-line card; having a third line in which donors could opt to allow the CJA decide how to split the gift; and putting more money into the federation's financial reserve fund.

"We decided to revisit the issue after the campaign," says Koffman.

His personal view is that the two-line card system should be maintained.

He points out that the local line in the 2002-2003 campaign is up six per cent thus far over the same period last year,,and the campaign is raising more money overall. – M.L.

Rethinking assumptions on terrorism

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The horrific terrorist attack in Bali earlier this month has led some, including members of the media, to rethink their basic assumptions about the nature of such atrocities.

The always engaging Australian-born writer Clive James, writing in the Guardian (Oct. 16) under the title "Don't blame the West," tore a strip off those journalists and others who, before the Bali attack, had accepted as a given "the prepared text" that American foreign policy was to blame for the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

"A concept basic to the 'prepared text' was that there could be no end to all this deplorable but understandable Islamist outrage until the Palestinian matter was settled. Not just the majority of the intellectuals, academics and schoolteachers, but most of the face-workers in the media, share the view that terrorism is to be explained by the vices of the liberal democracies."

Questioning the "capacity for analysis" of those who hold the perceived "blame American foreign policy" wisdom, James wonders whether now, after the Bali nightmare, they will give up this consensus view, as he calls it, and see that "the true instigation for terrorism might not be the vices of the liberal democracies, but their virtues."

The terrorist attack in Bali also revealed a major inconsistency, yet again, in the media's application of the words "terrorism" and "terrorist." Surely, part of this "capacity for analysis" involves some journalists coming to terms, finally, with the use of these words, and coming to terms with the double standards some major media organizations are guilty of in Israel's case.

For instance, CBC senior management has argued that, in accordance with its journalistic guidelines, the term is not to be used, and that where it has been employed – as in reports on the Sept. 11 attacks and the trial for Ahmed Rassam, who was convicted for conspiracy to bomb the Los Angeles airport in December 1999 – it has been done in error.

Yet, interestingly, the CBC's own ombudsman's office disagrees, noting correctly that nothing in the CBC's guidelines prevents a journalist from calling a spade a spade and thus using "terrorism" where it properly applies. CBC journalists, both in TV and radio, did not shy away from calling the deliberate mass slaughter of civilians in the Bali nightclub "terrorism" and those who perpetrated the horror, "terrorists." Neither did journalists from the BBC and the Guardian – both of whom, like the CBC, generally refuse to apply the term to the slaughter of Israelis.

The contrast to Israel's case, then, could not be more stark. In many journalists' reports, including the CBC's Paul Workman's, about the horrific Oct. 21 attack on a bus near Hadera that left 14 Israelis dead and scores badly injured, the word "terrorism" is nowhere to be found.

Calgary mourns the death of Rabbi Seth Binus

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — When their son was born two days after the death of Rabbi Seth Binus, Leonard and Kim Bercovice chose to name the baby Michael Shays (Hebrew for Seth) after the man they considered to be a tzaddik, a righteous person.

The rabbi of Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel (HOJMI) was a friend, a spiritual leader and a teacher for the Bercovices – and for many other people in the Jewish community of Calgary who are still mourning his death.

"You want to name your children after great people, and if our son could be like Rabbi Binus, he will be a great person," Leonard Bercovice said in an interview.

Rabbi Binus died on Sept. 27 at the age of 30. Although his life was too short and he lived in Calgary only a few years, the rabbi touched the lives of many in this community. He is remembered with fondness and respect.

"The only way I can describe him is that he was a mensch," said Nelson Halpern, a personal friend who served as president of HOJMI during the rabbi's tenure. "He never had a bad word to say about anybody. He was very careful not to criticize anyone. He never raised his voice and always expressed positive thoughts."

Rabbi Binus was born and raised in Newton, Mass. He attended the Solomon Schechter Day School from kindergarten to Grade 8. Although his family attended a Conservative synagogue and was not particularly observant, Rabbi Binus chose to attend the best Jewish high school available in the area – the Orthodox Maimonides High School. He discovered how personally satisfying the Orthodox way of life could be.

In an interview upon his arrival in Calgary, Rabbi Binus said, "I liked the lifestyle, I liked the consistency of belief and practice; it made sense to me."

While still in high school, Rabbi Binus decided to make it his life's work to bring his love of Judaism to others. He studied in several yeshivot in Israel and attended Yeshiva University in New York, where he received a BA in psychology and then graduated with his rabbinic certification (smichah) as well as an MA in Jewish education.

He took up the position as rabbi of House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel in 1998. It was his first full-time pulpit.

In January of this year, Rabbi Binus travelled to New York, and while there, was diagnosed with an inoperable brain tumour. He then went to Boston, where his parents live, for radiation treatment. He spent his last six months in New York with his wife, children and in-laws.

His illness and his death at such a young age shook the entire Jewish community of Calgary, many of whom were influenced by the way Rabbi Binus lived his life.

Leonard Bercovice, for example, said that Rabbi Binus practised what he preached in "seeing things through Torah-tinted glasses." This was an expression Rabbi Binus himself used in his teaching, and it is a concept he tried to impart to others.

"He was a brilliant man," Bercovice said. "In conversation, he put a Torah perspective into everything. You could tell it was his life."

Bercovice respected the rabbi's skills as a "great teacher," and spoke with admiration of his habit of leaving the pulpit on Shabbat or holy days to teach young people or smaller groups of adults.

As a frequent guest at the Binus's Shabbat table, Bercovice was also struck by how much the rabbi enjoyed Shabbat and how much he loved spending time with his young family.

Herb Rosenberg, an active member of HOJMI, said that "Rabbi Binus possessed an amalgam of many strengths crowned with a sincere, humble, honest disposition."

Welcoming and discreet are other adjectives used to describe the rabbi, and several members of HOJMI remarked that he was a very good listener.

"He'd always try to understand before he'd open his mouth and say anything," Halpern said.

Rosenberg commented that Rabbi Binus was very easy to work with and "no matter how thorny the issue, he always took the high road."

Halpern agreed. "He was thrust into challenging situations and always manoeuvered them admirably. Considering that he was 27 years old when he came to Calgary and that this was his first big job out of school," he accomplished a great deal, Halpern said.

Among those accomplishments was the resolution of a community kashrut concern. To address the issue, he had to work with other local rabbis. Perhaps because of his own personal religious journey from Conservative to Orthodox, Rabbi Binus enjoyed excellent relations with the other rabbis in the city.

"I consider this a loss of a friend, not just a colleague," said Rabbi Moshe Saks of the Conservative Beth Tzedec Synagogue. "It is a great loss to the community and we grieve with his family.

"He was dedicated to community. Our community is so special because all the rabbis talk and co-operate and he was instrumental in making that happen."

One of Herb Rosenberg's fondest memories is of Rabbi Binus's talent as a storyteller.

"Whenever he gave a class or d'var Torah, he would often include a story drawn from our sages or related to his own personal experience," Rosenberg said.

Rabbi Binus is survived by his wife Deena and his two daughters, Sarah Devora, 4, and Shulamis Yaffa, 3.

Three Israelis killed in Ariel suicide bombing

By JONATHAN LIS and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Three Israelis were killed and at least 18 people injured Sunday morning in a suicide attack on a gas station at the entrance to Ariel, the largest Israeli settlement in the northern West Bank. All of the fatalities were IDF reservists.

At least 18 injured in the blast

Both the militant Hamas organization and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, which is affiliated with Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed responsibility for the the bombing, the second in Israel in the last seven days.

Maj. Tamir Massad, 41, from Kfar Masarik and 1st Lieut. Matan Zogron, 22, from Itamar, were killed in the Ariel attack, Israel Radio reported. The name of the third victim was not immediately released.

At least 18 people were injured in the blast – three of them seriously – which occurred at around 11:30 a.m. A fourth body, originally believed to be another victim of the blast, was later confirmed to be that of the bomber.

The bomber arrived at the gas station, and was spotted by a worker at a nearby cafeteria who informed her boss that the man looked suspicious, Channel Two television reported.

The owner of the cafeteria and an attendant at the gas station approached the bomber, and, identifying him as a terrorist, wrestled him to the ground and held him down.

The two men then shouted, "Terrorist! Terrorist!" which summoned the soldiers. The troops opened fire at the bomber, hitting him three times.

"They called on him and approached him," Rami Sonnenfeld, a police commander at the scene, told Israel Radio. "As they were trying to overpower him, the terrorist blew up and a number of people were injured."

It was not clear if the bomber or the bullets detonated the explosive device.

As a result of the explosion, there was a small fire at the gas station, which firefighters quickly extinguished.

"The terrorist was still burning when we got there, and we extinguished the fire immediately," a fire brigade official said.

Yeruham Mendola, a spokesperson for Magen David Adom, told Israel Radio that the injured were evacuated to Beilinson Hospital, Rabin Medical Centre in Petach Tikva; Sheba Medical Centre, Tel Hashomer and Meir Hospital in Kfar Saba.

"Once again, the vicious agenda of Palestinian terrorists has taken its toll," said David Baker, an official in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office. "Like spectators, the Palestinian Authority stands by and does nothing while Palestinian terrorists continue to wage a campaign of terror against Israeli civilians."

Ariel, some 35 kilometres north of Jerusalem, was the scene of another suicide attack in March – the first the settlement had known – when a bomber blew himself up in the lobby of the Eshel Hashomron hotel, injuring 14 people.

In a separate incident Sunday evening, an Israeli suffered light-to-moderate wounds from shots fired at his vehicle as he was travelling between the Gaza Strip settlements of Morag and Atzmona.

Sharon: we accept 'road map,' but not settlement freeze

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday that Israel accepts the principles presented in the United States' road map for Mideast peace, but he added that a total settlement freeze would be unacceptable, Israel Radio reported.

Ariel Sharon

Speaking before the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, Sharon said exceptions need to be made in order to provide for the natural growth of the settlements.

This was the second time that Sharon had commented on the U.S. road map given to him two weeks ago during a visit to Washington D.C. The first time, last week, Sharon said the plan was not "credible" and there was "a danger Israel will face a timetable that only it is required to keep to."

The six-page plan was worked out by the "Quartet" – the the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia. The Americans are now collecting Israeli, Palestinian and other regional comments on it before a final draft is approved by the Quartet in December.

Among other things, the plan calls for Israel to withdraw to pre-intifadah lines, dismantle illegal outposts and cease military operations in Palestinian Authority areas.

The Palestinians are required to name a prime minister, reorganize their security forces into a single entity and reinstate security co-ordination and co-operation with Israel.

A new security co-operation agreement is also envisaged. The plan would put Quartet supervisors in the territories to judge when the sides have reached each stage, so that they can move onto the next one.

The American plan proposes convening an international conference that would lead to setting up a temporary state at the end of 2003. By 2005, the "final" permanent settlement is due to be signed, but it is doubtful whether the parties will meet these target dates.

Three Iranian Jews released from prison

By MICHAEL JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Three of eight Jews imprisoned in Iran on charges of spying for Israel have been released, raising hopes that the remaining five will be set free soon.

Released last Thursday were sporting goods merchant Javeed Beit Yakov, 42, who had been sentenced to nine years in prison; and religion teachers Farzad Kashi, 32, and Shahrokh Paknahad, 24, who had received eight-year sentences.

The men had served three and a half years of their sentences on charges of aiding the "Zionist regime." Israel has said the charges are baseless.

U.S. advocates for the Jewish prisoners, who over the years have been outspoken in their defence – and harshly critical of the Iranian government – did not comment on the release.

Their silence seemed to stem from the hope that the other five would be released soon, and a fear that gloating might discourage Tehran from freeing them.

There was no official word from Iran on the release, which analysts said might be due to a supposed power struggle between relative moderates in the Iranian regime who favour detente with the West and conservative clerics who have maintained a grip on power since the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

"Due to the extraordinary circumstances surrounding this release, we at this time choose not to make a comment," Pooya Dayanim, spokesman for the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations in Los Angeles, said in a statement. "We are in contact with the U.S. State Department – which has shown a great commitment to human rights and religious freedom in Iran – to formulate a response over the next few days."

Two other activists at the forefront of the campaign to free the Jewish Iranians – Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the Iranian American Jewish Federation in Los Angeles – also declined to comment.

And Israeli President Moshe Katsav, himself Iranian-born, was said to be muted in his reaction.

Prior to the release, he was quoted in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz as saying, "To my delight, no evidence has been found against them, and most of the [imprisoned Jews] will be released in the near future."

But there was no official statement from Katsav last Thursday.

For months, analysts have suggested that several factors may be pressing Iran: U.S. President George W. Bush's statement lumping Iran with Iraq and North Korea in an "axis of evil," the prospect of a U.S.-led war against Baghdad, and the possibility that Iran may be the next target of America's year-old war on terrorism.

Europe, a significant economic partner, reportedly has cited Iran's disregard for human rights and its treatment of minorities as impediments to improved relations.

Some U.S. activists had hoped that the eight Jews would be pardoned on the eve of the Jewish New Year in early September, but that failed to materialize.

According to analysts, the tension between Iranian hardliners and reformers influenced the original arrests, and may determine the fate of the five still in jail.

Thirteen Jews were arrested in January and March 1999, but three were found innocent of the espionage charges and released. The other 10 were sentenced in July 2000 to jail terms of four to 13 years.

The men appealed, and Tehran reduced the sentences from two to nine years in September 2000. Two men already were released after serving out their terms.

Israel has flatly denied that the Jews were its spies. Advocates for the men say that what really bothered Iranian authorities was the men's increasingly fervent brand of Orthodox Judaism.

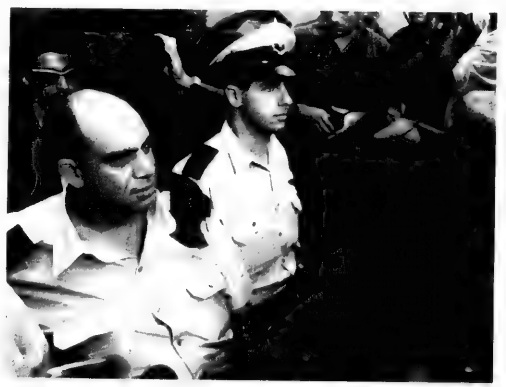
Most of the men were religious leaders from the southern Iranian city of Shiraz, a bastion of religious conservatism.

The arrests were perceived as a warning to the rest of the community, and initially there was fear the men might be executed.

In addition, observers say, inciting the public against the "Zionist enemy" and "collaborators" in their midst is an easy way for the mullahs to distract the masses from their economic hardship and lack of freedom.

In May 2000, after more than a year in solitary confinement, the 13 gave "confessions" for Iran's Revolutionary Court. But their advocates – and media, diplomats and human-rights experts from around the world – pronounced the closed trial a fraud.

Only 22,000 to 25,000 Jews remain in Iran today. The community stood at about 100,000 before 1979.



COURT APPEARANCE: A special military court in Tel Aviv last week remanded in custody Lieut.-Col. Omar al-Hayeb (seated, left), one of 10 people suspected of handing sensitive information to a militant Lebanese organization in exchange for drugs and cash. Al-Hayeb, from the Bedouin village of Beit Zarzir, was charged with having illicit contact with an enemy agent, espionage, treason and importing and exporting drugs. The other accused men formerly served in the Israel Defence Forces. The suspects are accused of trading information to Hezbollah for a prolonged period in exchange for drugs and cash payments totalling millions of dollars. Five others, also suspected of spying for Hezbollah, were charged the same day in the Nazareth District Court. The Shin Bet security service and the police recently uncovered the Hezbollah-operated spy ring in Israel, the largest of its kind since the IDF pulled out of southern Lebanon 2½ years ago. October 21

• Thirteen Israelis were killed and more than 45 injured when a jeep laden with explosives plowed into a bus near Hadera in northern Israel. Israel did not retaliate immediately and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer attempted to quash media speculation the United States was pressing Israel to restrain its response.

October 22

• U.S. Assistant Secretary of State William Burns urged Lebanese leaders to exercise restraint along the border with Israel in case of a U.S. attack on Iraq. Israeli officials have warned that if the United States strikes Iraq, Hezbollah may open a second front with Israel.

October 23

• An ambulance donated by Florida Jews was the first rescue vehicle to respond to the terrorist attack in northern Israel on Monday. The Magen David Adom ambulance was put into use hours after its arrival in the country.

October 24

• Israel's Supreme Court ordered a parole board to review its decision to release a man convicted in the 1983 murder of a Peace Now activist. The court upheld a state appeal, which argued that Yona Avrushmi still poses a threat to public safety.

October 25

• Israeli forces left the West Bank town of Hebron, withdrawing troops and removing military vehicles. Hours earlier, the army began a large-scale operation in Jenin to apprehend terrorists. Six members of Fatah were injured in the operation, and 20 were arrested.

Israeli freed from Moscow theatre

Lisiansky also said the terrorists, who stormed the theatre last Wednesday night with threats that no one was leaving the building until Chechnya was liberated, didn't give the hostages any food.

"Food we didn't get," she said. "We got water and went to the toilet but it wasn't really a toilet, it was stairs."

She said she was feeling well and thanked the Russians for taking care of her.

Lisiansky, who immigrated to Israel with her son and mother from Moscow 11 years ago, works for the Haifa Municipality. She was visiting her father in Moscow and went with several friends to the Melnikova Street Theatre, where she was taken hostage along with some 750 people. It was Lisiansky's first visit to Russia after moving to Israel.

Close to midnight last Wednesday, the terrorists allowed the hostages to make brief phone calls to their families. When Lisiansky's relatives told the Israeli Embassy in Russia and Foreign Ministry that she was in the theatre, they were instructed to keep her whereabouts a secret for fear the Muslim rebels would find out.

During the crisis, Lisiansky managed to send messages via Short Message Sevice (SMS) to her 14-year-old son Stas, her husband Alexander, 46, and mother Viktoria, 66, in Israel. In her first message, she tried to calm her family down. In a later message, she gave her son her bank account number and told him that he and her mother would be her beneficiaries.

Information about Lisanskaya's presence among the hostages was leaked last Thursday by the Russian television station NTV, owned by businessman Vladimir Gusinsky. But apart from a Friday report in Yediot Aharonot, Israeli media outlets heeded the Foreign Ministry's requests not to release information about the Israeli hostage.

Last Saturday afternoon, a family relative in Moscow called the Lisianskys in Nesher and reported that Valeri was in city hospital number 13, in good condition.

Describing the ordeal, Stas, Alexander and Viktoria said, "Everyone knows about the connection between the Chechens and the Palestinians," said Alexander, explaining why news of his wife's situation had been kept secret. "Clearly, it would have been very dangerous had the kidnappers known there was an Israeli woman in the theatre."

"I'm very happy it ended this way," said Stas. "I had a feeling this would end well."

Labor appears ready to quit coalition government

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — With the Labor Party Central Committee's unanimous decision on Sunday for its Knesset faction to vote against the 2003 budget, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is considering cobbling together a narrow government because he is against elections now, Likud sources said.

The sources said Sharon does not feel that with a looming U.S. war on Iraq and the economy in dire straits, the time is right for an election. Furthermore, they said, Sharon is not eager to face Benjamin Netanyhu in a Likud primary race, which would be forced on the prime minister if he "goes to the president," meaning if he calls a snap election.

Sharon considers his options

But the appearance for the first time on Sunday of a clear majority in the Labor Party Central Committee to vote down the budget – if its demands for NIS 710 million to be cut from the settlements' allocations are not met – could likely lead to Sharon firing the party from the coalition and to new elections.

Sharon would have to draw the National Union-Yisrael Beitenu bloc into the coalition if he wants to guarantee it at 60-plus seats, bringing the government further to the right.

Sunday night, after Labor chairman and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer won a resounding approval for his plan to vote against the budget if Labor does not achieve what it wants in negotiations with the treasury, sources close to Ben-Eliezer were saying that he won't hesitate to go back to the Central Committee with the recommendation to stay in the coalition.

The opposition to the budget combined with the heated race for the Labor party leadership, as Ben-Eliezer and his challengers, Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna and MK Haim Ramon delivered keynote speeches.

Ben-Eliezer criticized Sharon's earlier call for all the parties in the coalition "to demonstrate national responsibility" and vote for the budget.

"All those preaching to me about unity and responsibility should stop preaching," said Ben-Eliezer. "What kind of unity is it when most of the population is required to give and give and a minority that has a lot of power gets more and more? What kind of unity is it when there's an economic war and the finance minister refuses to cut the settlements' budgets? If it's war, why do you draft only part of the people and give exemptions to others? That is not how to conduct a war, Mr. Finance Minister, that's not how to build a budget and that's not how to rehabilitate the Israeli economy."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, speaking during a ceremony marking the seventh anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, spoke about the economic growth brought by the peace process under Rabin, compared to the current economic distress with no peace process, and said the budget should be reapportioned. Labor sources said they expect Peres to make efforts in the coming days to find a compromise on the remaining budget disputes which, in addition to the settlements issue, include pension cuts and cuts to subsidies for students and single-parent families.

As the Labor Party inched closer to bolting the government in a crisis surrounding the vote over the 2003 budget, the far-right National Union-Yisrael Beiteinu alliance met Monday to discuss backing the government on the budget in exchange for a commitment to oppose the United States' road map for Mideast peace.

Members of the far-right Knesset faction fear the plan will lead to the creation of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The secular Shinui party also met Monday to discuss providing the government with a safety net on the budget, should Labor go through with its threat to vote against it.

Prague conference eyes anti-Semitism

By MAGNUS BENNETT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — Failure to combat Holocaust denial could lead to the failure of civilization, a survivor told a conference here.

Czech Jewish writer Arnost Lustig was one of a number of speakers from Israel, the United States, France and the Czech Republic who gathered recently to discuss anti-Semitism in central and eastern Europe in the years since the fall of communism.

The conference covered the beginnings of modern anti-Semitism in the region as well as issues relating to the current extremist scene.

In his speech, Lustig said the issue of Holocaust denial was not simply about the truth of the Holocaust, but whether mankind would allow lies to be presented as truth.

"We are witnesses to an attempt at colossal deceit over history," he said, arguing that if mankind believed the lies it would doom itself to a repeat of history.

"The fate of human beings," as well as the meaningfulness of human history, "is at stake," he said.

Lustig also warned that people should not underestimate what appears to be an innocent joke at the expense of Jews.

"Jews are first defamed and denigrated and then killed," he said. "To underestimate that is tantamount to suicide."

Holocaust denial was also raised by a Czech political science student, Vaclav Nekvapil.

He argued that while there was little sympathy in the Czech Republic for anti-Semitic prejudice, there was the "burning problem" of the spread of easily accessible incendiary literature, such as the works of Holocaust denier David Irving.

"It is in my opinion, extremely dangerous when a pseudoscientific – basically anti-Semitic – study by an author unknown to the readers is presented without any explanation whatsoever, giving the appearance of a serious historical work," Nekvapil said.

He added that Czech extremist groups on both sides of the political spectrum use anti-Semitism as part of their rhetoric. The more subtle, left-wing anti-Semitism is often overlooked, he said.

The two-day conference was hosted by Radio Free Europe and held under the auspices of Czech Prime Minister Vladimir Spidla and the president of the Czech Senate.

Improving Hebrew literacy

NEW YORK — With a recent study reporting the decline of Jewish students' affiliation with Judaism, Read Hebrew America/Canada 2002 (RHA/C) aims to reconnect them with their heritage by providing them with one of the most important tools in Judaism – Hebrew literacy.

The fifth annual RHA/C campaign, organized by the National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP), began October and continues through November, with 1,550 classes offered at more than 735 locations across North America. NJOP will teach more than 15,000 unaffiliated and marginally affiliated Jewish students at 34 Hillels how to read Hebrew free of charge.

A study published this past June by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, reported the following statistics revealing the level of religious practice among incoming college students:

- 57.5 per cent of Jewish students spend zero hours in prayer and mediation, compared to 31.7 per cent of non-Jewish students;
- 15.9 per cent of students spend more than one hour per week in prayer, compared to 33.8 per cent of non-Jewish students;
- 13.3 per cent of Jewish students in first year reported "frequent" attendance at religious services during the year prior to university, compared to 46.6 per cent among non-Jews.

On a national level, there is evidence of a significant decline in Jewish affiliation and identity among American Jewish adults. According to the 2001 American Jewish Identity Survey, only 68 per cent of the core Jewish population said their religion was Judaism, down from 80 per cent in 1990. Additionally, 33 per cent of Jews are married to non-Jews, compared to 28 per cent in 1990.

"These statistics show that more and more Jews are leaving the faith and that the future of Jewish continuity in North America is at risk," said Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald, founder and director of NJOP.

"NJOP believes that one of the main reasons people are leaving the faith is that they do not know how to read Hebrew. This year, we are specifically targeting college students as they are the future of our faith and the Jewish leaders of tomorrow."

For the first time, RHA/C participants will also have the opportunity to learn how to write Hebrew, with many RHA/C courses ending with a one-day Hebrew writing crash course.

RHA/C courses will be offered this November at synagogues, Jewish community centres, Hillels and other Jewish organizations throughout the United States and Canada. Classes are offered over a five-week period. Course materials will be available in Russian and Spanish as well as in English.

Hebrew, the language of the Jewish people for close to 4,000 years, is the primary language in which virtually all Jewish prayer books, holiday services and significant religious texts are written and read. NJOP hopes that by learning to read the language, many unaffiliated and marginally affiliated Jews will renew their interest in the Jewish faith.

RHA/C is based on NJOP's popular Hebrew reading crash course, which, since 1987, has been taught to more than 165,000 North American Jews. Designed for Jews with little or no Hebrew knowledge, the program teaches the Hebrew alphabet and basic reading skills. A Level II program is available to those who are interested in advancing their reading and comprehension skills. NJOP was established in 1987 by Rabbi Buchwald and has become one of the world's largest and most successful Jewish outreach organizations. It offers free programs at more than 3,500 locations across North America, and in 29 countries worldwide. Through programs such as Read Hebrew America/ Read Hebrew Canada, Shabbat Across America/ Shabbat Across Canada, NJOP has reached more than 650,000 North American Jews.

For a complete list of U.S. and Canadian locations hosting RHA/C courses, visit NJOP's Web site at www.njop.org.

Former You're Beautiful host takes to the stage

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Actress, writer, broadcaster and author of the best-selling book Making It, Micki Moore will be putting on another hat when she takes to the Poor Alex Theatre's stage in a one-woman comedy show Women Who Talk Too Much And The Microphones That Love Them.

Micki Moore

In fact, she will be putting on a number of hats, wigs and assorted accessories to bring 10 very unique characters to life. Moore draws from women she has encountered and used her imagination taking each character to the edge as far as she can go.

Teamed with Poor Alex Theatre's artistic director Ian Ferguson, Moore, known to many as host of CITY TV's successful daytime series You're Beautiful and WTN's Double Duty, showcased her one-woman offering at the intimate Poor Alex Cabaret this past summer. It was such a hit that Ferguson invited Moore back to perform her one-act comedy in the larger theatre environment.

"Ian had blind faith in my material and my ability,"says Moore.

The sad news of the state of the world is one the reasons Moore felt compelled to make people laugh. Each character makes a speech in front of a different group including the delirious bride Gwenyth Mayo, or Rosedale matron Muffy Meredith – a takeoff on a former Moore neighbour, who suffers a bad case of foot and mouth disease when politically correct comments just don't come from her mouth.

Cornelia Ogglebottom is an Etobicoke Film Board Reviewer, who by doing her job became addicted to porn. Not so coincidentally, Moore who serves on the Ontario Film Board, knew of such a woman.

"The Bar Mitzvah mother Zelda Rifkin is based on a real life incident. This mother had never spoken in front of a group of people. She was so nervous they plied her with drinks, so by the time she stood up she was totally soused. These are the kind of moments I tried to capture. I think everyone has to give a speech at one time in their lives, research says it is the number one fear even before death," explains Moore.

Closest to her heart is the true to life character of Miriam Meisel, a Southern Jewish girl from the bayous of Shreveport, La., who moved to Canada 40 years ago and now goes by the moniker Micki Moore.

"When I got married to a Canadian, the southern rabbi drawled, 'Maaay theee looord bleees youuuu aaand keeep youuuu aaas youuuu leaaave fooor theee giaaant tuuundraa'tooo theee noorth.'" This sent the shy, naïve southern belle to the library to look up the meaning of tundra – a vast arctic wasteland.

To lose her southern accent, Moore studied at the Royal Conservatory. "I finally learned to talk Canadian – A, E, I, O, U, eh?"

To get over her shyness Moore enrolled in Improv classes at Second City. Her teachers included Ferguson and John Candy. "Improv was like fun and therapy all wrapped up in one. It opened me up in a very creative way and made it easier to speak. That is why I became an interviewer because I didn't have to speak very much, I'd just sit down and people would tell me their whole life story."

A woman of many artistic and journalistic media, Moore prefers hosting duties on the tube. "I grew up in television. The television studio is a first home to me. I now teach seminars on how to be a television host, anyone interested can go to my website www.mickimoore.com and drop me a line," she says.

Women Who Talk To Much And The Microphones That Love Them plays at the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave., Toronto Thursdays to Saturdays from Oct. 31, to Nov.16 at 8 p.m. Call 416-923-1644.

The tragic heroes of Vilnius Ghetto subject of new book

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

N.N. Shneidman, a retired university professor living in Toronto, says he wrote his new book about the wartime Vilnius Ghetto in order to relate historic events and details never before published in English.

The book, published by Mosaic Press of Oakville, Ont., and called The Three Tragic Heroes of the Vilnius Ghetto, focuses on Yitzhak Witenberg, Yechiel Sheinbaum and Jacob Gens. Witenberg and Sheinbaum were leaders of opposing Resistance movements, while Gens was a lead ghetto administrator who contended that co-operation with the Nazis offered the best chance of survival.

"My objective was to show that Jewish disagreements in the internal strife in the Jewish community was always hurting Jewish survival," the author said in a recent interview. "It hurts now in Israel and it hurt during the war in Vilna."

Shneidman, who lived in the Vilna Ghetto and witnessed much of its history, said he was motivated to write the book after realizing that many historians had glossed over the substantial differences between Witenberg and Sheinbaum, claiming their two movements had eventually united, and had dropped the latter figure from the story.

"They were never united," Shneidman says. "Sheinbaum's name and his organization disappeared from history – they're in one Hebrew book but there's nothing about them in any of the books in English. I felt that he and his organization deserved an honourable place in the history of the Vilna Ghetto and its uprising."

Witenberg, a communist, was leader of the United Partisans Organization (FPO), which advocated fighting the Nazis in the ghetto.

"He had this idea that the proletarians in the ghetto would rise up and fight the fascists. That was a stupid illusion because the people in the ghetto didn't want to fight the Nazis because everybody knew there was no chance of survival. They had learned that from the Warsaw Ghetto."

Sheinbaum, a strong Zionist, was leader of a second fighting organization whose strategy was "not to fight in the ghetto but to go into the forests as soon as possible to join the partisans," he says.

"That was the basic disagreement. My contention is that if both organizations had worked together, at least another 300 youngsters from the ghetto could have been saved in the forests."

Shneidman did not know Sheinbaum personally, but saw him fall dead during a skirmish with the Nazis on Sept. 1, 1943.

Gens, the ghetto's third tragic figure, "believed that if the Jews worked for the Germans well and supported the German economy, it would make it possible for them to survive. But this was also an illusion. When the Germans discovered an underground organization, they decided to liquidate the ghetto step by step, and you couldn't stop it." The liquidation occurred on Sept. 23, 1943.

All three figures died heroically and possibly needlessly, given that each could have escaped, Shneidman says.

Shneidman is the author of seven previous books, including Jerusalem of Lithuania: The Rise and Fall of Jewish Vilnius (Mosaic Press, 1998), which includes a semi-biographical account of his experiences in the city of his birth, which was known as Vilna to the Jews.

A historical centre of Jewish learning in eastern Europe, Vilna was supposedly dubbed "the Jerusalem of Lithuania" in the 17th century because it was home to 300 scholars who knew the Talmud by heart.

Shneidman served during the war with the partisans in the forest and later with the Soviet Army. He came to Canada in 1958 and was a professor of Slavic studies at the University of Toronto for 25 years. He has also written books on Soviet education, sports and literature, including one titled Dostoevsky and Suicide.

He is scheduled to speak about his latest book on Sunday Nov. 3, 1:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre as part of the Jewish Book Fair.

Poems connect the past, present and future

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nancy-Gay Rotstein calls poetry an "illogical passion" that she is compelled to pursue, but her most recent collection of poems, a 25-year retrospective, displays a precise approach to her work.

Nancy-Gay Rotstein

Her ability to distill everyday life experiences into poetry aside, Rotstein is also known for the prescience that appears in some of her older poems, read in hindsight.

Rotstein, who will read poems of special Jewish interest from This Horizon and Beyond – Poems Selected and New at the Jewish Book Fair, said the poems in the book represent "the enduring connection of the past, the present and the future," the underlying idea for the book's title.

One section chronicles her family life from the time her now-adult children were small. She withheld the poems with the intention of publishing them as a unit at the suggestion of poet Irving Layton, who taught a workshop she took and who also wrote the book's foreward.

While her family poems deal with her personal life in a way that reflects universal family bonds, other poems show her personal take on more general universal issues. The Visitor, a poem she is often asked about, begins "I saw Alfred Dreyfus/at the Bagel Bar."

Although she wrote it in 1979, it "deals with where we are at today. It's a predictive poem," said Rotstein in an interview. "This poem was written as a warning in a period of complacency to express my concern for the future – that anti-Semitism can crop up anywhere.

"Our collective Jewish history permeates my consciousness and is reflected in my poetry," she said. Rotstein, who has a law degree and a Master's in history, feels strongly that only in the context of the past can people make sense of the present and to some degree anticipate the future.

Many of her poems were inspired by her travels, among them trips to Israel and China. Vienna Visit, with its images of "gun-carrying polizei" and "stained stones/of Judenstrasse" has a sense of foreboding that foreshadowed a shooting incident several months after she wrote it in 1979.

A more personal poem, The Victim, was a response to her feelings on turning 30. "Laughter doesn't seem worth the wrinkles," she wrote, referring to herself as "victim of the youth cult/the unwilling traveller."

"As soon as I wrote it, I felt great," she said.

Rotstein sees This Horizon and Beyond, which was published simultaneously in Canada, England and Australia, as a mosaic of her writing, unified by the resonance of Jewish experience. The book jacket illustrates that theme, with its image of a floor mosaic from Masada.

Although she has served on boards of arts and government agencies, Rotstein considers herself first and foremost a writer. She has published three previous books of poetry and a novel.

Rotstein believes poetry is in a period of renaissance. "What I hope readers would experience is to discover connections they might not have seen before, to reach an awareness into their own life. All of us are feeling very fragile in this moment [following Sept. 11], powerless to control unfolding events. Poetry gives us something to hold onto, something that steadies us."

Rotstein will read at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Toronto on Nov. 6 at 1:30 p.m.

JCC PRODUCTION REVIVES MEMORIES OF VILNA GHETTO

The vibrant culture and courage of the Vilna Ghetto is recalled in Culture As Resistance, a dramatic evening honouring the memory of those who lived and died in the ghetto.

Assembling to perform a concert, a group of ghetto artisans brings the rich and brave cultural milieu back to life. The production is based on Shmerke Kaserginsky's three-volume Yiddish memoir, I Was A Partisan, which recounts true stories of hope and courage from the Vilna Ghetto and the forests of Poland.

Culture As Resistance is based on an adaptation by actor-playwright Alex Poch Golden and is directed by Jennifer H. Capraru. Performers and participants include Theresa Tova, Liza Balkan, Sophia Perlman, Mitch Smolkin, Viva Youth Singers, the Kaeja d'Dance Company, the Miles Nadal JCC Community Choir and Yiddish scholar Hindi Nosek-Abelson.

Presented as part of Holocaust Education Week, the program also includes a screening of Welcome to Vilna. Made in the late 1930s, this short film is the last to capture the look and sound of Vilna's Jewish community.

Miles Nadal JCC, Spadina and Bloor. Members free, non-members $10. Saturday, Nov. 9, 7:30 p.m. 416-924-6211.

Exhibit showcases Israeli photographer's 50-year career

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Israeli photographer Rolf Kneller, who has recorded Jewish history for more than 50 years as a news cameraman and film photographer, will present an exhibit of photographs at Holy Blossom Temple from Oct. 22 to Dec. 19.

Now in his 80s, Kneller took pictures of events during World War II and in Palestine leading up to the establishment of the State of Israel.

Born in Berlin, Kneller was an active member of the Zionist youth movement. In 1939, his family escaped from Germany and settled in Palestine, where he worked as a film cameraman and still photographer and joined the underground Haganah.

With the permission of the Haganah, Kneller, like many other members of that pre-state Jewish militia, joined the British army. He said that during the time he served, Jewish units of the British army engaged in underground activities such as purchasing weapons and channeling illegal immigrants to Palestine.

In 1946, Kneller married Anne, a nurse (who was active during the siege of Jerusalem in 1948) and he resumed his career as a photographer and his activities with the Haganah. Their first daughter was born during Israel's War of Independence.

Kneller has worked for several international news agencies, including Visnews in London (which later became Reuters Television) and for Reuters TV slide service.

As a motion picture photographer, he worked with such stars as Frank Sinatra, Danny Kay and Shelly Winters and was director of photography for the film High Noon.

Stephen Posen, a member of Holy Blossom and a friend of Kneller, brought his work to the attention of Esther Hersh and Beryl Chernin, co-chairs of Holy Blossom's fine arts committee.

"His photographs are an important pictorial record of the history of Palestine, the founding of the modern State of Israel, and much more," Hersh said.

The photographs in the exhibition will be available for purchase, she said.

An opening reception, hosted by Posen and Robyn Kestenberg, will be held Oct. 22 from 7 p.m. to 9.30 p.m. in the temple's Cecile and Harry Pearl Gallery.

1963 film about life in a death camp

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Frank Beyer's Naked Among Wolves is a cinematic curiosity – the first German feature film about life and death in a Nazi concentration camp.

Presented by the Goethe Institut as part of Holocaust Education Week, the two-hour movie will be shown on Saturday, Nov. 9 at 7: 30 p.m., the 64th anniversary of Kristallnacht, as it happens.

The screening takes place at the Goethe Institut, 163 King Street W.

Released in 1963 in East Germany, Naked Among Wolves is set in Buchenwald in 1945, just weeks before the American army liberated that notorious camp.

Based on a novel by Bruno Apitz, who was himself a Buchenwald inmate, it revolves around a group of German and Polish political prisoners suddenly faced with a totally unexpected moral quandary.

What are they do with a Jewish boy whom a recently arrived Polish prisoner has smuggled into the camp in a suitcase?

The lad, whose parents were deported to Auschwitz, was spirited out of the Warsaw ghetto when he was three months old and raised by this Polish man.

If the boy is discovered by the guards, he will surely be killed, as might be some of the prisoners.

But if he is allowed to stay, the prisoners will be risking their lives to care for him.

Naked Among Wolves, whose title is quite apt, opens with a rollcall. As the inmates assemble for an inspection on a gloomy spring morning, rumours spread of a U.S. military breakthrough.

"The Americans have crossed the Rhine," they murmur repeatedly, hope springing eternal.

Although the U.S. military campaign is uppermost in the prisoners' minds on this dank day, it is the Jewish orphan who will preoccupy them for the next few weeks.

Try as they might to keep his presence a secret, a German guard stumbles upon him. For opportunistic reasons, he decides not to report his discovery. The "Jew brat," he tells his wife, might be useful to them in case Buchenwald falls into the hands of the Americans.

He is not the only Nazi in the camp looking over his shoulder anxiously. With the U.S. and Soviet armies closing in from the west and the east, the camp commandant knows the game is up.

The film, shot in stark black and white tones, is so understated and surrealistic in its portrayal of telling details that it sometimes resembles a documentary.

Naked Among Wolves is also more or less apolitical, and this is surprising because East German films were usually reflexively anti-American. In deference to the United States' role in liberating Buchenwald, the criticism has been withheld.

The most tense moments in the film occur when camp authorities, having been tipped off about the boy's whereabouts, issue a demand for him. The prisoners feign ignorance, knowing they have incurred the wrath of the Nazis

No sooner has the crisis eased than another one erupts. Fearing that Nazi plans for the camp's evacuation may be to their temporary disadvantage, the prisoners do their best to delay and thwart it.

One of the most graphic and powerful scenes is triggered by the disclosure that Buchenwald has been freed of Nazi tyranny. The prisoners stream out of their barracks in a fan-like formation, and overhead cameras capture this euphoric moment beautifully.

Western viewers will not be familiar with the cast of German and Polish actors. But they might recognize Armin Mueller-Stahl, who defected to West Germany shortly after the making of Naked Among Wolves and then made a name for himself in the West.

Toronto hospitals conducting diabetes study

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Researchers at Toronto General and Mount Sinai hospitals hope to determine whether Ashkenazi Jews have a genetic predisposition to develop the complications of Type 1 (what used to be referred to as juvenile onset) diabetes.

Complications of diabetes can be severe, including problems with the eyes, kidneys, nerves and heart.

The principal investigator is Andrew Boright, assistant professor in the department of medicine at the University Health Network, in collaboration with Bernard Zinman, professor of medicine and director of leadership at the Sinai Centre for Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital. The study is being sponsored by the Canadian Diabetes Association, in collaboration with Mount Sinai Hospital.

Boright told The CJN they are looking for volunteers to join the study. To participate, you must be between 18 and 30 or have had Type 1 diabetes for at least 10 years at the time of diagnosis, be of Ashkenazi Jewish ethnic background, already have complications from Type 1 diabetes or have a child, parent or sibling with one of the criteria.

The hope is to get at least 150 families to take part over the initial two-year span. After that, Boright said, they hope to expand the study across Canada and to Israel.

Participants will be interviewed about their or their relative's medical history, and give blood samples. Research co-ordinator Sasan Khah said that the team will try to make things as convenient as possible, even going to the person's home if necessary.

Type 1 diabetes, which affects 10 per cent of those with the illness, is an autoimmune disease, which leads to the destruction of the pancreas, and then to a complete insulin deficiency. They require insulin to survive.

Type 2, the more common form of the disease, tends to affect older adults, especially those who are overweight. Their pancreas produce insulin, but their bodies are unable to use the insulin.

Boright explained that Ashkenazi Jews are a good population to study, because over the course of the years, "while there have been contractions and expansions of the population, in general it is fairly homogeneous compared to other ethnic groups," principally because marriage tends to occur within the group.

Also, he said, North American Jews are experienced in taking part in genetic studies, especially because of the Tay-Sachs screenings, and they may therefore be more receptive than some others.

Boright said he hopes to concentrate his study on "why do some people have poor control of their diabetes, but still don't get the complications? And the other way around."

Once the factors are identified, he said, and "we have a better understanding of the physiological factors and so on leading to complications, then we can find pharmaceutical possibilities to deal with them."

Also, he said, the study can identify those at a higher risk for complications, and target them for more aggressive therapy.

However, he said, the idea is not so much to benefit susceptible individuals at this point as it is to possibly "find the important genes and proteins to help us understand the biology behind those problems."

There is likely not just one gene that is responsible for allowing someone to develop those complications, he noted. "Probably there are several genes, that each can lead to a small chance of complications." It would be when those different genes come together that the problems arise.

Those interested in taking part in the study can contact Sasan Khah at 416-340-4800, ext. 5612.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am under the impression that avocado and mango are both high in fat. Is this the case?

A. Avocado is very high in fat (however, it is good fat) and mango is not high in fat at all. Both are nutritious and delicious.

Q. I have started buying organic produce, especially for my children. What are the most important produce items to buy organic?

A. The most important items to buy organic are the ones known to be most contaminated with pesticides. Some of these are strawberries, red and green pepper, cucumber, green beans, peanuts, raisins, celery, spinach, some grapes, cherries, cantaloupe, apples and oranges. All of these are now widely available in organic varieties around the country.

Q. Do you believe that certain food groups should not be eaten together?

A. Definitely not. I believe that we can effectively digest what we eat and lose weight while eating all foods together. I do, however, think that all meals should include protein (meat, fish, poultry, dairy, eggs, soy, nuts or legumes), and that starches should not be eaten alone, as they make you more hungry later on and cause you to crave more carbohydrates.

Q. My 14-month-old loves olives and pickles and can't seem to get enough. Is this normal?

A. This is very typical. Kids who are just starting to eat table food are likely so excited to eat food with flavour that they love salty food. It is perfectly fine; just encourage lots of water, too.

Ex-model now creating her own portraits

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As a former New York model, photographer Sheila Reisman has had experience on both sides of the camera.

But the Toronto and Collingwood resident says, "I prefer photographing to being photographed."

Reisman's photographs are currently on display at the Gallery at the Bay in Thornbury, Ont. She recently completed a successful one-artist exhibition at the Collingwood Public Library's gallery titled People and Places.

"We have had a phenomenal response to Sheila Reisman's show," said Carole Stuart of the library's arts advisory council.

Reisman's work ranges from portraits and gardens to seascapes and street scenes in black and white, colour, sepia-tones and mixed media.

"I express myself through the beauty of life, nature, people and their emotions," Reisman says. "But my preference is people. When you look into their eyes, you see their souls.

"Every picture I take has a story to it."

Reisman, who was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., says that since her mother gave her a camera when she was five years old, she has always been fascinated by photography. She studied at the New York Institute of Photography and at Boston University before she moved to Toronto 30 years ago when she married commercial land developer Al Reisman.

Her award-winning photographs have brought her recognition in Canada, the United States and England. She has had numerous solo and group exhibitions in Ontario, including in Toronto, Collingwood, Niagara Falls and Thornbury, as well as in New York and London, England. Her work is on display in many private and corporate collections, including at the Merchants Bank of New York, the State Attorney Office in Tampa, Fla., and the Hospital for Sick Children and the Rose Corporation in Toronto.

The mother of six, who travels throughout the world to take her photos, recently returned from China. She will be an exhibitor at the prestigious Level Gallery Mixed Media show in Collingwood from Dec. 15 to Jan. 30.

For more information on Reisman's exhibitions and photographs, call 705-445-3333 or e-mail her at sreis14128@aol.com.

Jewish skaters start new season

BY HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Perhaps it's because Jewish parents have always placed a high priority on education that many gifted athletes of an earlier era followed the royal road to learning rather than pursue a career in sports.

That might explain why there was such a scarcity of aspiring minor pro Jewish hockey players in the middle of the 20th century.

Oh, there were a few prominent players such as rearguard Hy Buller, a former Detroit Red Wing and New York Ranger, rugged defenceman Larry Zeidel with Detroit and Philadelphia, Max Kaminsky, a Boston Bruins centre, and the pioneer Jewish player in the NHL, Samuel Rothschild, who toiled with the Montreal Maroons and New York Americans.

On the positive side, however, it should be noted that today there are a growing number of Jewish players on the cusp who skate and wait in the minor leagues in places such as Mobile, Macon, and Roanoke. All, not so patiently, anticipate the big call-up.

At the NHL level, Washington Capitals centre Jeff Halpern, 26, a former college hockey standout at Princeton, can no longer be described as a surprise. He has, despite his injury-riddled season last year when he scored five goals and added 14 assists, established himself as a superior penalty killer and an excellent faceoff specialist. Signed as a free agent in 1999, Halpern scored 18 and 21 goals in his first two injury-free campaigns with the Caps.

The Potomac, Md., native is a former Hobey Baker Award nominee (for top U.S. college player) who set a Princeton University scoring record with 28 goals and 25 assists in 1997-98.

The six-foot, 195-lb. Halpern's main challenge this time around will be to overcome last year's serious knee injury, which limited him to just 48 games.

Los Angeles Kings defenceman Mathieu Schneider, who was drafted in the third round by Montreal, is, with the passage of time, starting to wear down. At 33 years old and with 14 campaigns under his belt, he is frequently described as "oft injured." Last year, due to a variety of ailments, he missed 27 games.

The six-foot, 190-lb. left-handed shooter managed seven goals and 23 helpers last year while spearheading the NHL's best powerplay unit. The highest-paid Jewish hockey player of all time at $3,250,000 per season moves the puck very quickly and has an excellent shot from the point. He is also a former Islander, Leaf and Ranger, as well as having played for Les Canadiens.

His mother, Aline, is a French Canadian who converted to Judaism when she married. Although now divorced, she remains Jewish.

Steve Dubinsky, 32, is indeed a travelling man. Last season, the six-foot, 190-lb. centre played on four different teams. He was with Norfolk and Milwaukee of the American Hockey League, scoring a total of 20 goals in 52 games, and added one game-winner at the NHL level with the Chicago Blackhawks as well as five markers with the Nashville Predators.

In August, Dubinsky was signed by St. Louis as a free agent. The versatile one-time Clarkson University player is a good skater, intense competitor and valuable commodity late in games and for important faceoffs.

Unfortunately for him, less than 48 hours before the Blues' first game, he was sent to Worcester of the American Hockey League. But Dubinsky's a handyman and his return to the NHL can be expected.

Andrew "Bubba" Berenzweig will begin the season with the AHL Milwaukee Admirals. The sturdy six-foot-two, 215-lb. left-handed shooting defenceman was one of the Nashville Predators' last cuts just days before the team's Oct. 9 opener.

Last year he played in 23 games with the Admirals, recording two goals and three assists, and 26 games with Nashville, firing three goals along with seven assists.

The 1996 fifth-round draft pick of the New York Islanders and a former star at the University of Michigan will doubtless be the first rearguard recalled when an injury occurs in Nashville, since the parent club is still high on him.

Last summer's NHL amateur draft saw three Jewish youngsters' names called. Left wing Eric Nystrom, a freshman at the University of Michigan and the son of former Islander Bob Nystrom, was picked 10th overall in the first round by Calgary (the highest Jewish draft pick ever); Adam Henrich, a left winger with the Brampton Battalion of the Ontario Hockey League, whose brother Michael was a first-round Edmonton selection in 1998, was chosen in the second round by Tampa Bay; and goalie Robert Gherson of the Sarnia Stingers was selected in round five by Washington.

All three have been returned to their amateur teams by the parent clubs.

Another NHL draftee who has been sent back to his junior team to gain more seasoning is centre Eric Himelfarb, a sixth-round pick by Montreal in 2001 who scored 35 goals and added 48 assists with Sarnia last winter.

Former Erie Otters (OHL) forward Cory Pecker agreed this past summer to a three-year-pact with the Anaheim Mighty Ducks. He was originally drafted by Calgary, but was never signed. The 21-year-old Montreal skater is a prolific scorer. In his last junior season, he scored 53 goals in 56 games, adding 25 more goals in 21 games in the playoffs. The right-winger will start the season with Cincinnati of the AHL.

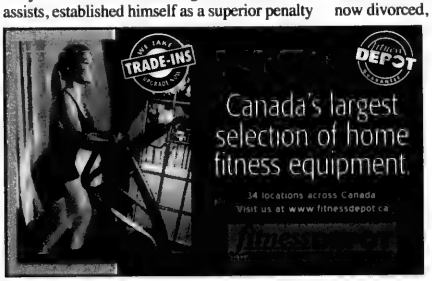
Four other AHL players who are also just one step away from seeing NHL action are forward David Hymovitz, a late cut by the Ottawa Senators, who was shipped to Binghamton; defenceman Jeff Dessner, now in the Colorado organization, was sent to the Hershey Bears; right wing Michael Henrich is back in Hamilton with the Bulldogs; and New Jersey draftee Max Birbraer, a left winger from Kazakhstan who formerly played for Israel, returns to the Albany River Rats.

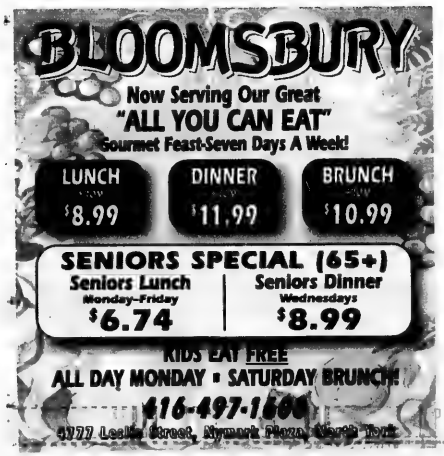
One step down from the AHL in the East Coast Hockey League, you can find Shawn Mamane, a forward with the Richmond Renegades. Other Jewish skaters in that circuit are Sandy Cohen, Aaron Fox, Greg Gardner, and Justin Kearns.

In the United Hockey League, look for goalie Aaron Vickar and defenceman Robert Stark, teammates with the Missouri River Otters, plus centre Harold Hersh who played in Quad City and Rockford last year.

And lastly, remember former Buffalo Sabres' prospect, forward Todd Simon? He now plays with the Essen Mosquitoes in the Elite German League.

A pesky lot, aren't they? Not the mosquitoes, but the aforementioned aspiring Jewish players who just won't quit.





ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

אחז ומוז מכפר קאקארוז...

פרחים באביב".

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

If you want to become a better baker, you need a copy of The Baker's Dozen Cookbook (William Morrow, $59.95 Cdn). This book is packed with tips and contains the collective experiences and favourite recipes of some of the most respected bakers in the business. Learn the secrets of making perfect pastries, breads, cakes and cookies.

These tender little cakes deliver a gush of bittersweet chocolate sauce from within and can be prepared well ahead of baking. Mmmm!

MOLTEN CHOCOLATE CAKES

softened butter and sugar, for the ramekins
8 oz. semisweet or bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
8 tbsp. (1 stick) unsalted butter, cut into bits
2 tbsp. milk
3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
2 large eggs, separated, at room temperature
1 large egg white, at room temperature
1/8 tsp. cream of tartar
3 tbsp. sugar
sweetened whipped cream (to garnish)

Lightly butter insides of six 6-oz. custard cups, sprinkle with sugar; tap out excess.

In a medium stainless-steel bowl placed in a skillet of hot – not simmering – water, melt chocolate and butter, stirring often until smooth. Remove from heat. Measure 6 tbsp. into a small shallow bowl. Add milk and stir well. Place in freezer while preparing rest of recipe.

Stir cocoa and egg yolks into remaining chocolate-butter mixture.

In a grease-free medium bowl, whip egg whites with cream of tartar until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in sugar until peaks are stiff and glossy but not dry. Fold about 1/4 of egg whites into cocoa mixture, then fold in remaining whites. Spoon batter into custard cups, filling half full. Set remaining batter aside.

Remove chocolate-butter mixture from freezer; it should be firm. Using a dessert spoon, scrape up mixture and roll into 6 truffle-like balls. Embed a truffle into the centre of each custard cup, top with remaining batter and level the tops. Place on a baking sheet. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate at least 3 hours. (Can be prepared and refrigerated up to 3 days ahead.)

Position rack in lower third of oven; preheat to 400. Bake until cakes are puffed and cracked and a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out gooey, about 12 minutes. Let cool for 3 minutes.

Run a thin knife around inside of each cup to release the cake. Protecting your hands with a towel, invert a cup in the centre of a dessert plate to unmold. Repeat with remaining cakes. Serve immediately with a dollop of sweetened whipped cream.

Suicide strikes are war crimes: report

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Suicide terror strikes are crimes against humanity and war crimes, says Human Rights Watch, an international human rights organization based in New York.

The organization's conclusions on such terror strikes were released last Friday in a new report titled Erased in a Moment: Suicide Bombing Attacks Against Israeli Civilians.

It analyzes the modes of operation and organizational structure of Palestinian groups that have taken responsibility for suicide strikes. It also details international standards that prohibit attacks against civilians and examines the terror organizations' finances and the role played by the Palestinian Authority.

The Human Rights Watch report emphasizes that international law and the rules of war impose an absolute, unconditional ban on harming civilians.

The report explicitly names the political leaderships of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine as being responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Due to these organizations' centralized power structures, it is inconceivable that terror strikes could be carried out without instructions and inspiration from their top political leadership echelons, the report states.

The report assigns political responsibility – but not criminal responsibility – to Fatah and the Palestinian Authority, headed by President Yasser Arafat, for war crimes carried out by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades.

The brigades, which are Fatah's military arm, operate with relative autonomy in local areas; and, the report explains, its findings suggest that Fatah's military wing does not take orders from the PA's, or Fatah's, political leaderships.

Manitoba solidarity mission

A 51-member solidarity mission from Manitoba toured Israel last week. The mission included Manitoba Premier Gary Doer, Minister of Health Dave Chomiak and his deputy Milton Sussman, plus 16 members of the Manitoba Health department. The remaining participants came from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and were led by its president Ian Goldstine and mission chair Melvin Lazareck. "We have been planning a solidarity mission to Israel for a number of months now," explained Goldstine. "In the late summer, the New Democratic government of Manitoba approached us and said they would like to show solidarity with Israel in a tangible way," Goldstine said. Above, from left, Doer, Chomiak and Sussman stand by a wreath placed at the site of the Park Hotel suicide bombing in Netanya last Passover. [Israel photo]

Campaign targets UNICEF

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A grassroots e-mail campaign is calling on Canadians to voice their concerns to UNICEF about a lack of context in a recent UNICEF press release that criticizes Israel for preventing Palestinian children from attending school.

The campaign, which coincided with UNICEF's Halloween fund-raising drive, criticized UNICEF for "not mention[ing that] the closures are the result of terrorism and suicide bombers."

It also criticized the international relief agency for employing Syrian actor Dourade Lahhan as a "goodwill ambassador" after he compared U.S. president George W. Bush to Hitler and expressed pride in his association with Hezbollah during a tour of the Lebanese border as a guest of the terror group.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Ban Hezbollah: CJC

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress is urging new solicitor general Wayne Easter to add Palestinian and Arab terror organizations to the list of banned groups under Bill C-136, the anti-terrorism act. In an Oct. 25 letter, CJC repeats its earlier call to add groups such as Hezbollah, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade to the list of "entities knowingly engaged in terrorist activity" released by Easter's predecessor, Lawrence MacAulay, in July. Regarding Hezbollah, CJC also repeated its call for the government to freeze all of its assets in Canada and abandon its "specious" distinction between fund-raising for the group's humanitarian and military activities. But Foreign Affairs Bill Graham said Canada will not make such a move, saying it would "label as terrorists" innocent doctors, teachers and others aid workers.

Trains Ordered

MONTREAL — Canada's Bombardier Transportation has received an order from the Israel Railways to deliver another six four-car double-decker trains between May and July 2004 for use in the Tel Aviv area. The $47 million deal is a follow-up to one signed in 1999. To date, 23 trains have been ordered. The six new trains will be made in Gorlitz, Germany.

ISRAEL

Temple Wall OK

JERUSALEM — A group of Jordanian engineers who investigated a bulge in the southern wall of the Temple Mount have recommended replacing some eroding stones. They concluded the wall is not in danger of immediate collapse. They were brought in to assess the wall as a compromise in a dispute between Israeli and Islamic officials over the problem. Israel blames the bulge on massive, unsupervised construction by the Islamic religious trust.

175 Suspects in Jail

JERUSALEM — Israel is holding 175 would-be suicide bombers in jail, Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said last week. Most were captured in the West Bank and Gaza in Israeli raids based on intelligence information, though some were intercepted en route to Israel, security officials said.

Terror Scare

TEL AVIV — An Israeli wearing a heart monitor set off a terror scare when he was mistaken for a suicide bomber at a shopping mall in northern Israel. Shlomi Shoshana tried to enter a mall in Nazareth-Illit when the device set off the security guard's scanner. At the guard's instructions, Shoshana opened his shirt, revealing wires strapped to his chest leading down to his belt. "Everyone who was in the area thought it was an explosives belt and fled," Shoshana said. "Luckily, the guard agreed to listen to me."

Sun, Fun and Exams

EILAT — Ben-Gurion University of the Negev opened its new campus here last month, with several programs being offered, including hotel and tourism management and behavioural sciences.

WORLD

Jewish Hostages Die

MOSCOW — At least four Jews, including two children, were among the dead in last month's hostage crisis at a theatre here, according to Russian Jewish community leaders. At least 20 Jewish hostages survived, some of whom were recuperating last week in hospital.

Sniper Suspects

TACOMA, Wash. — The two suspects in the Washington, D.C.-area sniper case allegedly fired gunshots at a synagogue in Washington state last May. The latest allegations against John Allen Muhammad and John Lee Malvo surfaced after a man in Tacoma, Wash., told police late last month that he had lent the pair his guns. Between May 1 and May 4, shots were fired at Temple Beth El in Tacoma. There were no injuries, and damage was minimal.

Five Iranian Jews Remain in Jail

NEW YORK — Contrary to earlier reports, five Iranian Jews accused of spying for Israel remain in jail after three others were pardoned and released late last month.

Sources close to the issue said last week Iranian authorities had granted the five an indefinite furlough. But the sources later said reports from Iran were "disinformation."

The men's uncertain status seems to underscore the precarious situation of the entire Jewish community in Iran. There are some 22,000 to 25,000 Jews there, down from 100,000 or so prior to the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

Both Israel and the Iranian Jewish community deny the men ever spied for "the Zionist regime," as Tehran alleges.

It's unclear what led to the dissemination of the false reports. Pooya Dayanim of the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations in Los Angeles said sources in Iran told him last week the five men were home with their families. He said he didn't know why the sources would provide erroneous information.

The five who remain in jail are: Dani (Hamid) Tefileen, 29; Asher Zadmehr, 51; Naser Levy Hayim, 48; Ramin Farzam, 38; and Farhad Saleh, 33.

Thirteen Jews were arrested in January and March 1999, but three were found innocent of the espionage charges and released. The other 10 were sentenced in July 2000 to jail terms ranging from four to 13 years, which were later reduced on appeal. Two were released after serving their terms.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi has no fight with Islam

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In April 2003 Rabbi Israel Meir Lau will reach the end of his 10-year term as Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel.

A charismatic speaker of whom it was said before he was elected that he could bridge the gap between religious and secular Jews in Israel, Rabbi Lau shook his head sadly in a recent interview and said he was afraid he had not accomplished that goal.

He attributes the ongoing divide in part to the murder seven years ago of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by Yigal Amir, a young Israeli from a religious Jewish family.

The bullets that killed Rabin also destroyed "some of the bridges we started to build between the sects in Israel," said Rabbi Lau, 65, sipping coffee between speaking engagements on a whirlwind one-day trip to Toronto.

"The wound is not yet healed, not only of losing a man, but of the unity of Israeli society – right and left, religious and secular."

In addition, he noted, immigration of more than 300,000 non-Jews from the former Soviet Union has brought issues of assimilation to the forefront.

"They demand their humanitarian rights, like building a family...We want to and we must survive, and not fall into the pit of assimilation... The only place where we can have a shelter to prevent this flood of assimilation is Israel."

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau

Just prior to the interview, Rabbi Lau had addressed an invited group at a private home about Israel's soldiers. That evening he spoke at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. The events were fund-raisers for A Shoulder to a Soldier, a new organization in Israel that provides support to soldiers from low-income families and those who don't have family in Israel.

During the Yom Kippur War, Rabbi Lau recalled, he was challenged by a soldier who objected to the rabbi's emphasis on the role of God rather than the skill of the soldiers, when he spoke to them with the intention of raising their morale. Rabbi Lau asked the crowd of 1,000 soldiers whether any of them had a grandfather who was an officer in an army. Nobody did.

"We have no military tradition," said Rabbi Lau, by way of explaining God's role. "Our zaidies and bubbies – none of them was a fighter."

Not only are Israeli soldiers "messengers of the Divine," he said, but he described how they put unity into practice, when, for example, four soldiers – one Ethiopian-born, the others Russian, Moroccan and Israeli-born – work together in one tank.

One thing that does unite all Israelis, the rabbi said that evening, is the desire for peace.

Although everyday life in Israel goes on, as the rabbi noted in his evening lecture, Israel's economic downturn in the past two years has affected soldiers, he said. Some of them don't have a home to go to when they are on leave, he noted.

In a country of fewer than six million people, said Rabbi Lau, 210,000 are unemployed. "That means more than 200,000 families." Organizations like a Shoulder to a Soldier can help individual soldiers concentrate on defending Israel rather than on their financial situation, said Rabbi Lau.

"We have no fight with Islam...they are afraid of their extremists," the rabbi told The CJN. He has met with Muslim leaders and last June took part in a summit of religious leaders in Bangkok that included Iranian ayatollahs.

"If the higher positions in the Islamic world... think they have to keep silent, it's very difficult to be optimistic."

Intifadah on its 'last leg,' Israeli analyst Ya'ari says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Most Palestinian leaders are in favour of ending the current intifadah, a leading Israeli political analyst claims.

They want to end the uprising because it is leading the Palestinians nowhere, declared Ehud Ya'ari in a speech at Holy Blossom Temple last week.

"We're into the last leg of the intifadah," he added, saying that the spate of suicide bombings has effectively doomed the intifadah.

In an aside, Ya'ari said that the end of Israel's armed conflict with the Palestinians is inextricably connected with the demise of Arafat's regime.

And final status talks on such key issues as borders and Jewish settlements will not begin until the Palestinian Authority (PA) has been completely reformed and transformed, he noted.

Ya'ari, who is chief Middle East commentator for Israel Television and a Jerusalem Report columnist, was in Toronto to deliver the first Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture.

He suggested that many leaders in the Palestinian Authority and the PLO blame PA President Yasser Arafat for the continuation of the intifadah, which is now in its third year.

Expressing doubt as to whether the Palestinians can maintain the same intensity of violence indefinitely, Ya'ari said the intifadah has caused widespread impoverishment in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

As a result, Palestinian society is disintegrating, he said.

Ya'ari, the co-author of a book on the first intifadah, said Arafat's goal in the current revolt is to gain statehood without paying the political price.

He did not elaborate, but pointed out that Israel's destruction is not Arafat's objective.

As Ya'ari sees it, the uprising turns on one major issue: will a Palestinian state be born in peace or in war?

Supposedly the first Israeli journalist to interview Arafat, he claimed that Arafat began making preparations for the intifadah in 1997 by arming the Tanzim, a Fatah militia.

Regular Palestinian forces have not taken part in the intifadah because Arafat has no intention of declaring war on Israel. But Arafat has tolerated an alliance between his own military forces and that of Hamas, Ya'ari said.

There was never a chance that Arafat would play the role that Israel assigned to him after Oslo. Arafat, he explained, refused to be the "undertaker of Palestinian rights."

And, Ya'ari said, Arafat viewed the 1993 Oslo agreement as a way of regaining control of Palestinian lands.

In Ya'ari's estimation, Arafat rejected Israel's peace offer at the Camp David summit in July 2000 for two reasons: He opposed an end-of-conflict agreement, which had been offered to him by Ehud Barak, the Israeli prime minister, and he didn't want to leave Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, Jordan and Syria in the lurch by giving up their right to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

A two-state solution, Ya'ari said, is in Israel's strategic interests because it would enable Israel to obtain a "divorce" from the Palestinians

But he warned that Israel cannot truly separate itself from the Palestinians.

"On the ground, we're still going to be together."

As long as there are suicide bombings, the Israeli army cannot afford to withdraw from the Palestinian autonomous areas, Ya'ari said. (Israel reoccupied major Palestinian towns in June after a series of suicide bombings).

But eventually, he predicted, Israel will pull out.

Sounding a sombre note, Ya'ari said the moment is approaching when the Israeli army will have no alternative but to invade the Gaza Strip, the chief base of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The purpose of the incursion will be to destroy the terrorist infrastructure there.

"Everybody in his right mind understands that."

In addition, Ya'ari made the following points:

- Israel could be pushed into becoming an apartheid state, like the old South Africa, if the Israeli government allows "Jewish settlers" in the territories "to dictate policy."
- Most Israelis are willing to relinquish most of the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza to achieve a viable accord with the Palestinians.
- The United States is likely to attack Iraq in late December or early January.

JEWISH LIFE IN GERMANY: The Consulate General of the Federal Republic of Germany in Toronto recently presented The Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University with a collection of books on Jewish life in Germany. The books include personal stories of life in post-war Germany, and about the struggle to find a Jewish identity in Germany after the Holocaust. Part of the collection deals with the great influence of Jewish authors on German literature. The book collection was presented by the Consul General of Germany, Dr. Klaus Rupprecht (left), to the centre, represented by (from left) York vice-president for research and innovation Stan Shapson; Prof. Mark Webber, co-director of the centre; and Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Bathurst JCC 'in great shape,' says president

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Economists like to point at "leading indicators" to determine what lays ahead for a national economy. For practitioners of the "dismal science," housing starts, manufacturers' orders and other statistical data can be mined to help forecast an economy's future performance.

A visit to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) last week turned up quite a different set of leading indicators – as well as some lagging indicators – which might be employed to help determine whether the community facility will enjoy a good, poor or middling year ahead. (Leading indicators help predict future occurrences; lagging indicators reflect past events.)

Though it was only mid-afternoon on a workday, the parking lot behind the BJCC was packed, forcing visitors into the nearby overflow lot. A positive, leading indicator.

Inside, the halls buzzed with the noise of dozens of adolescent and teen visitors, some clutching coffees (when did teens start drinking coffee?) from the nearby Second Cup kiosk. Another good sign, particularly for the caffeine-delivery industry.

In one of the building's two gyms, kids from United Synagogue Day School chased a puck around the floor in a raucous game of floor hockey. Another good sign.

Meanwhile, an older crowd of mostly senior citizens meandered through the men's health club, some taking up positions on the treadmills, others gathering for a game of cards in the facility's recreation area. Again, a positive indicator.

Downstairs, a mixed group of young and old did laps in the centre's indoor pool while outside, visible through the room's new windows, work continued on the BJCC's popular outdoor pool and surrounding deck. Nearby, a host of youngsters frolicked in an outdoor play area. Good; good and good.

All in all, the leading indicators seem to suggest the BJCC is attracting a variety of people to both its athletic facilities and its family-oriented programming. The bustle in the building is a far cry from the depressed state of affairs that plagued the centre several years ago after the Jewish Community Centre, the BJCC's forerunner, nearly went bankrupt and hemorrhaged members by the hundreds.

At its annual general meeting last week, BJCC president Helen Finder-Guttman recited the centre's "top 10 list" of accomplishments, noting in particular that "overall, the BJCC is in great shape." Since 1995, she reported, "overall centre revenue has grown 33 per cent."

Other "lagging indicators" are a 25 per cent growth in athletic memberships over the past year, "something we haven't seen for years" and an enrolment of more than 900 youngsters at Centre Camp, the BJCC's summer camp. "Our camp revenues have doubled over the last five years," Finder-Guttman reported.

In the past few years, the BJCC has spent $3 million in capital improvements. These include the renovation of the lobby/reception area, a new gym divider, new windows in the pool and gym, a new electronic card access system and improvements to the outdoor pool and deck area.

Sherry Kulman, the BJCC's executive director, said the centre's athletic membership has shot up to 4,500, while total BJCC membership – a figure that includes those who register for programs or courses but who do not work out at the facility – is now about 7,000, which is comparable to the centre's pre-crisis numbers.

In recent years, as the centre tried to put the near-bankruptcy behind it, it embarked on a strategic plan to reach out to young families and those in the 25-to-45 age range. "It's our next generation and we want to bring them in," Kulman said.

A family centre, located near the building's Bathurst Street entrance was recently launched, and the centre also offers pre-natal and post-natal classes, as well as story telling and Shabbat circle events, she said.

The BJCC is attempting to make itself into a real family destination, Kulman added.

Improvements to the facility have been undertaken on a prudent basis, said Brian Yellin, the BJCC's director of finance. The $3 million allocated to capital expenses was not borrowed, but rather came from donors, fees and government and private grants.

Unlike the free-spending ways that caused a financial crisis at the centre 10 years ago, today "the whole way we approach our business is different," Yellin said. "We're extremely lean and so our expenses are down. We only spend what we can afford to spend."

For the past seven years, the centre has either broken even or enjoyed modest surpluses. "I think it's a remarkable turnaround," Yellin said.

Jews today have to deal with attacks on the family structure, a threat of anti-Semitism equal to that faced in the 1930s, and a world of materialism, technological changes and a troubled economy, asserted Rabbi Tzvi Weinreb, vice-president of the Orthodox Union.

"The issue is not whether we can thrive in this modern world, but how we can survive it at all."

Rabbi Weinreb was the last speaker at a day-long seminar on Judaism in the modern world, held at Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation, under the sponsorship of Torah in Motion, an organization that provides programs in which Torah concepts are applied to the interface of modern society and Jewish law and thought.

Other subjects covered during the day included fertility, messianism and business ethics.

The traditional Jewish family is eroding, Rabbi Weinreb charged; it is decreasing in size and emotional strength, and thus is less able to pass on Jewish traditions to future generations.

The divorce rate in all sectors of Jewish society is four times greater than it was 20 years ago, and there is an increase in marital conflict, domestic violence, substance abuse, families in which both parents work and a growth in the number of singles.

"A recent 10-year survey said that the Jewish birthrate is 1.8, which doesn't even reproduce the current population."

Fifty-two percent of Jewish families are not having any children at all, the rabbi added, a rate which is double that of the general population.

Young people are poorly prepared for marriage, Rabbi Weinreb said. "They have no clue about finances, or the self sacrifice necessary to sustain a relationship."

Premarital education is more important than ever before, but it is just not happening, he said.

To add to the problem, he said, 80 per cent of families don't live in the same place as their parents do, and many children grow up without the influence and example of grandparents.

While there may not be the same overt anti-Semitism as there was in years past, "the modern spin offers the same lies and the same hatred, only magnified by modern technology which allows it to be spread quickly and efficiently to an infinitely wider audience."

Half a dozen countries are ready to ban shchitah (kosher slaughter), and one is ready to ban circumcision, he said, calling both issues merely a more polite form of anti-Semitism.

Respondents to a poll in France recently called Israel the second-greatest threat to world peace (Iraq was the first).

And Arab media, he said, even the moderate ones, are spouting Nazi-like propaganda, including such lies as that Jews use blood for hamantaschen. "They don't even get their lies right," he said.

There is a crying need to find spirituality in these troubled times, Rabbi Weinreb said. For both the young and the older Jew, this does not necessarily mean increasing religious practice, however.

In fact, he added, many think that Orthodox Judaism is the last place to find spiritual strength. "What excites people is not Judaism as an intellectual and philosophical discipline, but Judaism as an experience – the Shabbat table and the functioning family."

In a panel discussion following Rabbi Weinreb's talk, Elliott Malamet, a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), noted that in the religious community, there is a lot of denial of the volume and intensity of the problems affecting its youth, especially depression and substance abuse.

"How can we help [people with these problems] if the very people who should help are either denying that there is a problem, or say that they can't help because it will affect the shidduch possibilities of the other children?"

Jews, Rabbi Weinreb responded, are more conscious than other cultures of what others think of us. "We don't engage in daily self-examination and self-criticism as we are supposed to, and we don't forgive others."

Panellist Rabbi Jay Kelman, spiritual leader of the host congregation, charged that part of the problem is the fear that if Orthodox Jews discuss such problems, "the Reform will see us in a negative light, and Conservative Jews will look more religious than us."

He also said that there is much resistance among the Orthodox rabbinate to having dialogue with the non-Orthodox, and considerable criticism of those who do.

It is essential to have that dialogue, recognizing that Orthodoxy is a minority among the streams of Judaism, Rabbi Weinreb said. "Our goal must be to deal with Jews as Jews, and not be sanctimonious."

Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director of Jews for Judaism, objected to Jewish leadership "tolerating... rampant disrespect of the kedushah [holiness] of the synagogue," such as Kiddush clubs and talking during services, saying that this drives people away from mainstream institutions.

This doesn't happen as much in the haredi world, he said, citing widespread compliance with the recent edict against lavish spending at simchahs issued by the New York haredi rabbinate.

"You just wouldn't see this [obedience] in the modern Orthodox world," Rabbi Skobac said.

New safe house planned for abused women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Women International are seeking a homeowner to donate a self-contained basement apartment to house abused women and their families for periods of up to one month.

The new safe house will be an expansion of ASTEH, Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing, the organizations' joint project that, since 1988, has offered shelter housing for women and children in a kosher apartment for up to three months.

Debby Feldman, supervisor of the women's abuse program at JF&CS, says the new ASTEH-Safe House, to be launched as a pilot project using one home, will fill a need identified by JF&CS staff for a shorter term housing option for abused women and their children.

Home providers, who will be given training, must have families in which all members are over 21.

Generally speaking, Feldman says, if Jewish women choose to leave an abusive situation, they first try to find accommodation with family or friends, "and fortunately many can, but we need to maintain a place for those who cannot."

Unique partnership between JF&CS, JWI

From past experience, says Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI/Canada, ASTEH realized that a three-month, independent facility does not meet the needs of everyone, "so we began to explore other options. [The new ASTEH-Safe House] is an additional piece to be added to housing options."

Krowitz says ASTEH is the result of a unique partnership between a social service agency and a volunteer organization.

"The agency provides the professional services and the volunteers provide the emotional support and concrete help needed to maintain the home," she says.

The organizations' first goal, she says, is to find – after careful screening – a potential donor who will be provided with training about the issue of women abuse.

Feldman says the safe house could be used for women and children awaiting the availability of space in the ASTEH shelter; as a safe, supportive housing option for women and their children who need immediate shelter while waiting or making plans for other accommodations; or to provide them with respite from abuse and the opportunity to explore their options.

"It could be a stepping stone to something different."

Sometimes, she says, women are not ready to take the step alone. "The safe house provides the cushion of having other people around."

Feldman says she had one client who had become "completely drained" while living in the same house as her spouse from whom she was separated.

"Living like that can be a recipe for disaster, but she was hesitant about considering a shelter until she saw it as respite in the same context as a hotel would be. She decided to give it a try."

There is no pattern and no profile for the women who need shelter, she says. "Each case is different."

Krowitz said the Jewish community in Toronto can take pride in the fact that there is an agency that addresses such needs. "It does not happen in every Jewish community. It brings home for us things we take for granted."

Hezbollah agents fund-raise in Canada: report

Hezbollah has been using Canada as a base for fund-raising and buying supplies needed to carry out and videotape attacks against Israel, the National Post reported last week.

The paper quoted documents obtained from Canada's spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS).

The documents reportedly show how Hezbollah has laundered tens of thousands of dollars through Canadian banks while drawing on the accounts to shop for military equipment, the Post stated.

The report said Hezbollah agents "shopped for blasting devices, night-vision goggles, powerful computers and camera equipment used to record attacks against Israeli forces," according to dozens of CSIS wiretaps obtained last week.

Reportedly, the Canadian operation was so successful that CSIS agents overheard suspected Hezbollah operatives in Vancouver in early 1999 congratulating each other in a monitored telephone conversation.

The Post's story came just two days after Canadian Jewish Congress called on newly-appointed solicitor-general Wayne Easter to de-register all aspects of Hezbollah's activities in this country, and freeze all its assets.

While the United States has moved to de-register all aspects of Hezbollah's work in that country, Canada continues to make a distinction between the organization's military and "social-humanitarian" wings.

But in comments last week, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham said Canada would not ban Hezbollah's humanitarian arm, saying "We don't believe it would be appropriate to label as terrorists innocent doctors teachers and other people who are seeking to do charitable and other good works in their communities."

Wayne Easter

CJC said Hezbollah was most likely responsible for the 1994 bombing of the central Jewish communal building in Buenos Aires, which killed 86 people and injured hundreds of others.

CJC also called on Easter to add Palestinian and Arab terrorist organizations to the list of banned groups under Bill C-36, the Anti-Terrorism Act.

The Post story went on to say that even as they lived in Canada with their families as immigrants, the Hezbollah operatives denounced "Canadians and Zionists" in wiretapped conversations.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien recently defended Hezbollah as a political movement, and declined to condemn the terror group after he attended an event at the Francophonie summit in Beirut three weeks ago that was also attended by Hezbollah's leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah.

The Post said Canadian police and intelligence reports show Hezbollah has been using Canada in recent years to buy material, forge travel documents, raise money and steal luxury vehicles.

It said CSIS reports dated April, 2002, show that in 1999 and 2000, Hezbollah "sent detailed shopping lists to agents who were allegedly part of a network with operatives in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal who filled the orders and shipped the equipment back to Lebanon in courier packages.

"Hundreds of thousands of dollars were moved through various Canadian banks such as the Bank of Nova Scotia to finance purchases for what the participants referred to as the 'resistance' and the 'brave people.'"

Hezbollah's activities in Canada first came to light in the 1990s when an agent named Mohammed Hussein al-Husseini was arrested for deportation. He told CSIS about a vast cross-Canada network.

Fraud charge laid in Clinton fund-raiser

A local event promoter has been charged with fraud in connection with a fund-raiser for the Hadassah-WIZO in Toronto.

Toronto police charged Peter Janeteas, 42, with two counts of fraud over $5,000 relating to a fund-raising event for Hadassah last July that featured a speaking appearance by former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

Police issued a statement saying "a local charity has been defrauded of a substantial sum." Media reports last week said the amount was tens of thousands of dollars earmarked for charity, but less than $100,000.

More charges could still be laid, police added.

Police wouldn't say how the alleged fraud was carried out. However, some sources said it involved tickets to a $1,000-a-plate formal dinner with Clinton at the Thornhill home of Jewish communal activists Susan and Allan Fenwick. About 300 guests attended the dinner.

Earlier that day, Clinton and professional golfer John Daly were to play a round of golf at the Angus Glen club in Markham, but the game was cancelled at the last minute.

Proceeds from the dinner were to benefit a wide range of Hadassah programs for children in Israel, including schools, hospitals and research into disabilities.

Janeteas appeared in court last week to face the charges and was granted bail.

Louise Rosenbloom, director of the Toronto office of Hadassah-WIZO, said the group's lawyer has advised her not to comment on the case.

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The United Restitution Organization (URO) is appealing to Holocaust survivors for patience and understanding, especially when it comes to this past summer's announcement of the availability of two different German government pensions.

And the URO is defending its policy of charging fees to apply for one of the pensions.

With its Montreal office set to close Dec. 31, it will fall to two overworked employees in the URO's Toronto office to do the agency's work of helping survivors wade through the many overlapping and often confusing compensation programs, funds, and pension plans.

Regarding the latter, the cash-strapped URO is defending its policy of charging $50 and 12 per cent of the retroactive portion of benefits (not the ongoing ones) from one of the German pensions.

URO officials in Toronto point out that application forms for the pension are complex and that fees are also needed to pay lawyers in Germany. As well, the URO receives no funds from United Jewish Appeal.

The URO is not funded by Jewish federations anywhere, Marcel Lenz, its worldwide general director, told The CJN via telephone from Israel. "We are self-funding, and we must charge fees."

Founded in 1955 as an arm of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (known as the Claims Conference), the URO has 28 offices in 20 countries, and is headquartered in Frankfurt, Germany. When its Montreal office closes, the agency will be represented in Canada only by its Toronto office, staffed by Dora Elzbet and Helen Branova.

Given the recent flurry of activity on compensation for war-era slave labour, coupled with the German pensions, survivors are often perplexed. "It's been very confusing," Elzbet conceded. "People are confusing the pensions with slave labour [payments.]"

(To date, about half of the 230,000 applications for slave labour compensation have been paid out from the $7 billion [Cdn] fund set up in 2000 by the Germany government and German industries. These will be lump sum payments. Pay-outs continue at the rate of about 10,000 cases a month).

In June, Germany passed a law granting pensions to those who performed labour in wartime ghettos.

And in late August, a new pension agreement signed between Canada and Germany extended benefits to German-speaking Jews who were driven from their eastern and central European homes in the 1930s and '40s.

The URO in Canada has registered some 300 applications for pension payments for work performed in ghettos.

"This was not slave labour," Elzbet explains. "These were Jews who volunteered for work in factories, fields, and in mines. But they did not receive monetary remuneration. Often, they just got coupons or vouchers for food, or worked in exchange for lodgings."

Elzbet is quick to explain her use of the term "volunteer." "It's not like we say today," says Elzbet, who speaks seven languages. "Often they volunteered to avoid death. And sometimes, labourers were volunteered by the local Judenrat (Jewish council)."

Employers who used Jewish labour from the ghettos paid into German government pension funds, making the labourers eligible, Elzbet says.

Pension payments to former ghetto labourers are retroactive to July 1, 1997. The deadline for applications is June 30, 2003. Widows and widowers of labourers may apply on behalf of their late spouses.

Benefits will be based on the age of the applicant, and the type of work performed.

So far, the law is restricted to ghettos that were located in Poland and Lithuania. Elzbet says she has received some irate calls from ineligible survivors who were confined to ghettos in Hungary and Romania

According to a German embassy Web site, in order to be eligible for the pension, a person must fit the definition of "a victim of persecution;" they must prove a forcible stay in a ghetto in a German-occupied area or region incorporated into the Third Reich; they must have performed an occupation "in return for dispensation" in that ghetto; and they must not have received compensation from any other foreign social security system for that period.

It is for this pension application that the URO charges the processing fee, and 12 per cent of the retroactive portion of benefits only, not the ongoing ones.

The second pension agreement will affect far fewer Jews in Canada – probably no more than 50, the URO estimates. However, the signing of the agreement by Human Resources Minister Jane Stewart and Christian Pauls, Germany's ambassador to Canada generated wide media attention.

Benefits extended under this Supplementary Pension Agreement will take effect next year and will be retroactive to July 1, 1990. To qualify, a person must be a Canadian citizen, have lived in Canada since before July 1, 1990, and have been 16 years old or more when his or her homeland was overrun by the Nazis.

As well, applicants must have belonged to a "German language and cultural group," but not have acknowledged themselves to be "ethnically German" because they were Jewish.

Germany has agreed to similar provisions in its social security agreements with Israel and the United States.

Those who will qualify are said to number no more than 200 people in the United States. In Israel, about 2,000 people have qualified.

The URO says anyone who has received other German pensions or compensation payments, including from BEG or Article 2 funds, may still apply for these benefits. Neither pension is subject to Canadian income taxes, the URO says.

For information on compensation, restitution and pensions, call the URO at 416-630-2920.

Disarming Iraq

It would be astonishing if Saddam Hussein, out of the goodness of his heart, suddenly decided to reform himself and abide by a litany of United Nations resolutions calling on Iraq to destroy its non-conventional weapons of mass destruction. For Iraq's president-for-life to turn a new leaf and become a member in good standing of the civilized world would simply not be in character.

The UN Security Council is expected to pass a tough resolution this week demanding Iraq's immediate, full and unfettered compliance with these resolutions. If UN arms inspectors are not granted such access to Iraqi stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons, as well as to Iraq's nuclear facilities, they will be wasting their time and engaging in an exercise in sheer futility.

Since the departure of UN monitors from Iraq in December 1998, Iraq has had plenty of time to rebuild its deadly arsenal and thoroughly conceal it. Judging by Iraq's miserable track record since 1992, Baghdad will not make it easy for the inspectors to fulfill their mandate. In what will likely be a reprise of Baghdad's cynical cat-and-mouse game, Iraq will do its best to thwart their mission, and the UN will have achieved virtually nothing. We will be back to square one.

The fact of the matter is that Saddam's venal Ba'athist regime cannot be trusted, now or in the future. Saddam has grandiose regional ambitions, and he will not readily or voluntarily submit to a foolproof program of disarmament whose outcome is certain: the de-fanging of Iraq.

Iraq has been a source of almost constant instability in the Middle East since its disastrous invasion of Iran in 1980 and its fleeting occupation of Kuwait a decade later. If Iraq is not fully disarmed, Saddam will take that as a signal that he is free to carry on as before. He will try to dominate his neighbours and he will surely attempt to terrorize Israel. Let no one be under the comforting illusion that Saddam will angelically devote himself to improving Iraqi society.

History should be our guide. When Saddam withdrew his troops from Iran in 1988, he turned his baleful attention to Iraq's long-suppressed Kurdish population, decimating some 2,000 villages and killing 5,000 Kurds with poisonous gas in Halabja. In 1989, he threatened to "burn" half of Israel, and in the summer of 1990, he invaded Kuwait. If the United States and its allies had not intervened and trounced Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War, the so-called "mother of all battles," Saddam would have cast a covetous eye on Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states and perhaps even Israel.

It is clear that Iraq cannot be completely and irrevocably disarmed through the normal channels of a UN weapons inspection process. Saddam will not permit it, even as he sweetly promises co-operation. Iraq can only be disarmed through a full fledged regime change. Saddam's totalitarian and aggressive regime, which has been a menace to all for the past two decades, must be uprooted. And it can be if the United States, the world's sole superpower, uses its formidable military might to sweep away Saddam, once and for all. When that hour is finally upon us, for the good of Iraq and its neighbours, the Middle East will be a better, safer and far more stable region. —S.K.

In defence of Eli Pfefferkorn

In a recent letter to The CJN, Leslie Vertes of Montreal takes umbrage with Eli Pfefferkorn's well-researched exposé (CJN, Oct. 10 Letters, "In defence of Claims Conference"). In her rebuttal, Vertes says she found the Claims Conference's staff to be eager to provide information. But not everyone has had the same pleasant experience.

Although the Claims Conference sends out regular updates on existing programs, they receive funds from the Germans and the Swiss for these "outreach" services. Vertes's assertion that the Conference does not administer the Swiss funds is inaccurate. As for the German Social Security pensions (that indeed confer no financial rewards to the Conference), the Conference only followed suit (defensively) after our alliance of Holocaust survivor groups first brought these potential benefits to the attention of the survivors.

Vertes also says the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal receives annual reports from the Claims Conference that contain a breakdown of monies allocated to various communities. These reports, which are also received by all survivor organizations, only reveal what the Conference agrees everyone should know. Even in these self-promoting and superficial documents, the Conference admits that only about 10 per cent of their institutional allocations, from 1995 to 1999, went to Canada and United States combined. Does Vertes truly believe that only 10 per cent of the Holocaust survivors live in North America?

In the United States, bed-ridden and paraplegic indigent survivors receive, on average, only five hours of home-care per week, and many are on waiting lists to receive even these few hours. Yet an inside Claims Conference report (which we obtained and which was not made public) reveals it spent between $60 million and $100 million on projects of no direct benefit to survivors.

Here are some examples: $20,695,500 to the Jewish Agency for low-cost housing (but by 1995, survivors in Israel no longer needed housing); $427,300 to the Siberia and Far East committee (did the Germans ever get to Siberia?); $477,000 to the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research; $565,000 to the Leo Baeck Institute: $344,000 to the Kahal Adat Jeshurun; $525,000 to the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture; $430,000 to the Central Zionist Archives; $325,000 to the Kiddush Hashem Archives in Bnai Brak; $651,000 to the Central Archives/History of the Jewish People; and about $3 million to the World Zionist Organization.

These are all deserving causes, but they should be supported with funds from the general Jewish population, not survivors' restitutions. The money from the above examples alone could have provided for more than two million hours of home-care for lonely and ailing survivors.

We would suggest to Vertes that she thoroughly investigate the facts (as Pfefferkorn did) before jumping to the defence of the Claims Conference and subserviently reiterating their self-promoting rhetoric.

Response to CUPE coverage

Kol Hakavod to The CJN for its articulate criticism of CUPE Ontario and its leader Sid Ryan for their anti-Israel invective ("How Sad To Look Now Upon CUPE," CJN, Oct. 24). I too would like to add my admonition to CUPE along with my support of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, (CJC) for taking on Ryan and his union.

CUPE is the largest public service union in the country. Its attempt to demonize Israel must be met head-on. Many have been reluctant to take on CUPE due to its size and clout. Indeed, Ryan's fulmination against CJC's Bernie Farber for criticizing CUPE's anti-Israel tirade is the type of tactic used to try and silence us. Thankfully, the CJC and The CJN will not be silenced. By speaking out, they are demonstrating to our community that attempted bullying will not deter us from defending Israel.

R. Burstyn
Thornhill, Ont.

* * *

I read your cover story and editorial about CUPE Ontario with both interest and dismay (Oct. 24). CUPE Ontario leader Sid Ryan's comments are preposterous. Canadian Jewish Congress and its Ontario executive director, Bernie Farber, are criticized for being "anti-union." What heinous act have they committed? They have dared to stand up to CUPE's vicious diatribes against Israel and Ryan's support of CUPE's anti-Israel position – one that Ryan farcically calls "balanced." Ryan should recognize and understand that defending Israel doesn't make one anti-union. It is not surprising, however, that it might make one anti-CUPE Ontario, and maybe even anti-Sid Ryan.

A little Caribbean hope during the Holocaust

By ED BUTTS

The story may be but a footnote in the dark annals of the Holocaust, but it is one of the ironies of history that the Dominican Republic became a haven for Jews fleeing Nazi persecution in the early months of World War II. It was also to the shame of the western democracies – Canada included – that this little Caribbean nation which occupies two thirds of the island of Hispaniola was the only country in the western hemisphere to open its doors to Jewish refugees.

Luis Hess, now in his 90s and a resident of the popular tourist town of Sosua on the country's North Coast, was there at the beginning. Born in the eastern German town of Erfurt in 1908, Hess had left Germany in 1933 when Adolf Hitler came to power.

"I knew that Germany was no longer a country for me," he says now, in his comfortable Sosua home. "My family said this couldn't last for long, but I didn't trust the situation. So I left alone."

Hess went to Spain, where he lived until the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War. In 1936, he went to Paris, where he hoped to obtain a residence permit. France, however, was not welcoming Jews fleeing Germany and Austria, and Hess began a fruitless round of the western embassies, looking for asylum.

"There were many people who couldn't stay in France, and had nowhere to go. If you stayed in France too long, you would be arrested."

Paradoxically, in 1938, France hosted the Evian Conference, at which delegates from 32 nations met to discuss the growing plight of German Jews. A lot of sympathetic rhetoric was expressed at that assembly, but the Dominican Republic was the only nation that offered to take in the persecuted refugees.

Herein lies the irony: at that time, the Dominican Republic was ruled by Rafael Trujillo, a ruthless dictator whose regime was marked by murder and terror.

Just a year earlier, on his order, the Dominican army massacred some 20,000 Haitians working in the country. The old Spanish fortress in Santo Domingo, originally built to protect the city from pirates (and now a popular tourist attraction), was a prison where political dissenters were tortured and executed. Trujillo would maintain a bloody hold on power until his assassination in 1961.

Why a thug like Trujillo would open his nation's doors to Jewish refugees is an unanswered question. Some historians believe he wanted to improve his image with the Roosevelt administration in Washington, D.C., after the Haitian massacre. Others think he wanted to "whiten" the Dominican population. There is even a story that a Jewish girl had been kind to Trujillo's daughter when she was attending university in Europe, and he wanted to return the favour.

Whatever the reason, the Dominican dictator and his country would take in up to 100,000 Jewish refugees. Moreover, he would make 29,000 acres of banana plantation available to them. (The land, as it turned out, was not a free grant; they had to pay for it.) The newcomers would be free from religious persecution in this almost entirely Roman Catholic country, and could apply for Dominican citizenship. Their transportation and resettlement would be organized by the Dominican Republic Settlement Association (DORSA), which was funded by American Jewish organizations.

In June 1939, Hess met Virgillio Trujillo, the Dominican ambassador in Paris and the dictator's brother. In May 1940, he was with the first group of Jewish refugees – 37 adults and one baby – who arrived by ship in the Dominican Republic.

"When I had to leave France, I thought it was a disgrace," Hess says now. "I felt desparate that I had to leave... What I thought then was a disgrace was my luck. If I was still there, I would have gone to the gas chambers in Poland."

Sosua was, in fact, a backwoods wilderness, separated by mountains and bush from the main centres of Santo Domingo and Santiago. There were no roads. The highway to the town of Puerto Plata – such as it was – became an impassable swamp when it rained. Most travel was by horseback, as there were only two motor vehicles in the community. There was no electricity. The only communication with the outside world was through an old telephone switchboard.

> Dominican Republic became a haven for Jews fleeing persecution

But in spite of the heat and humidity, the mosquitoes, alien surroundings and despair over what was happening to their people in Europe, the Jews – city people, all – showed the resolve of true pioneers. To prepare a community for those who would follow, they cleared land, built a barracks and a synagogue, and started a school. Hess gave classes in Spanish and in English for those who hoped to go on to the United States.

The Jews, none of whom had any agricultural experience, failed in their attempts to become farmers. So they turned to cattle ranching. They founded Producto Sosua, a company marketing meat and dairy products. Producto Sosua flourished and today is one of the region's largest employers. Joe Benjamin, one of its executives, explained to me that the company office building in which we were sitting was one of the original structures built by the Jewish settlers. It had once housed a centre for gymnastics and crafts.

Sosua never came close to getting the 100,000 refugees Trujillo had spoken of. The Nazi occupation of Europe made that impossible. About 2,000 people actually made it to the Dominican Republic, and for many of those, the Caribbean was only a stopover on the route to the United States. Hess says there were never more than 700-800 Jews in Sosua at any one time. After the war, when the truth about the Holocaust became known, doors were opened and people moved on to the United States and Canada, and some even returned to Europe.

The Sosua Synagogue as it looks today.

But those who remained in Sosua had a marked influence upon the community. They put down roots and made it their permanent home. Some, like Hess, married Dominican women. Through contacts with family and friends in Europe, they brought attention to their beautiful tropical location, eventually making Sosua a popular vacation spot. Today the town has a distinctly European flavour.

In the middle of Sosua, next to the synagogue, is a little museum that tells the story of the Sosua Jews and their niche in history. It's a quiet reminder of how this little Caribbean nation became a flicker of hope in a time of darkness.

Growing up about growing old

I am writing this some ten days before my 90th birthday, which has been discussed quite widely in the media. Naturally, such attention is pleasing, but there is another side to it.

I have been concerned with the process of aging for quite some time, and have written and spoken about it. The bottom line is that society, in general, is not sure what to make of the aged. Which reminds me of a puzzle that my father posed to me many decades ago: "What is it that everybody wants to become but no one wants to be." The answer, of course, was "Old."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Unfortunately, the word "old" has both positive and negative connotations. It may be used as a term of admiration, but for others it is a term of derogation.

If you are in the market for antiques, you seek objects that have been produced long ago – often, the longer the better.

But with people, there is a fundamental difference. Once the description "old" is attached to them, they find themselves socially in an ever more difficult position. I know of many instances in which older people could not get a job, or their labour was scrutinized in a way that was likely to produce a negative judgment.

There is a presumption that there are many things that older people cannot do, that their minds don't function as they ought to, and people make other prejudgements that may be true for some but are not applicable to all who have reached three score and ten or more.

Now that I am about to reach four score and ten, I have made a full and, if possible, honest judgment of my capacities and lack thereof.

To be sure, certain skills such as those in golf and tennis have suffered to some degree, but they are still a great pleasure to me and a source of physical inspiration. I have been most fortunate in this respect and I know that my current experience may end any day – but that is true for anyone.

Jewish tradition, both in the Bible and in post-biblical literature, exalts old age as a blessing – even though in ancient times, many old people were likely beset by disabilities that nowadays are easily managed. That has always puzzled me, for most certainly many, if not the majority, of the elderly in ancient and medieval times did not enjoy good health. (Fortunately, I have escaped this problem, but I know that won't last forever.)

It is time that we integrated our aged population into the normal processes of life. We still have a bit of growing up to do in this regard, and I hope that I may live long enough to see it.

It's the economy... or is it?

I'm taking a risk in writing this column. At the time of writing, Israel's Labor party has not yet decided if it will leave the unity government over the 2003 budget. If Labor does resign, by the time you read this, the government will either have shrunk to a right-wing coalition, or Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will have called early elections.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

But I am writing about the budget debate in any case, because in Israel's coalition governments, budget debates are a microcosm of burning social and political issues. And regardless of the outcome, this year's debate has exposed all the tensions and inconsistencies of the unity government.

In a severe economic crisis that stems from the worldwide high-tech collapse and a prolonged, armed conflict with the Palestinians, Sharon and Finance Minister Silvan Shalom are committed to a draconian budget that has further weakened Israel's social safety net. Economic experts support the budget, and international credit agencies have warned that without it, Israel's credit rating will drop. But in drafting the budget, Sharon and Shalom barely touched the two constituencies that represent their traditional power base – the settler and Haredi sectors.

The result was a budget that cut back on old-age pensions and subsidies for low-income and single-parent families, but maintained existing levels of support for settlements and increased transfer payments to institutions controlled by the Haredi parties. The day the budget was tabled, the Ministry of the Interior published statistics indicating that established Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza would continue to receive up to six times more money in subsidies than poor development towns inside the Green Line.

This provided those in Labor who are opposed to the unity government with the perfect political ultimatum. While the public has maintained its support for a broad coalition, Labor has been criticized for losing its identity and voice in a coalition dominated by Sharon and right-wing parties. Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, the incumbent party leader who faces a challenge at the party convention later this month, has preferred to remain in a government that gives him visibility and a base of authority. His opponents, Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna and veteran populist politician Haim Ramon, both object to Labor's presence in the unity government. By opposing payments to the settlements and welfare cutbacks, they hope to regain Labor's voice as an effective opposition to Sharon's government, and in turn, to strengthen their own chances in the leadership race.

Until last week, Ben-Eliezer vacillated in his reaction to the proposed budget. But when internal party polls showed a narrowing gap between him and his opponents, he moved to the left and "discovered" the expenditure on settlements.

In reality, none of the figures were new, but their political usefulness was suddenly revealed. The result was a last-minute showdown inside Labor and between the two main coalition partners.

For Sharon, who faces former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the forthcoming Likud leadership race and who does not want to alienate his own right-wing constituency, any concession on funding for the settlements would hand his internal opponents a perfect weapon. For Ben-Eliezer, doing nothing on the issue would hand his opponents a perfect weapon with which to expose his complicity with Sharon's policies.

The tragedy is that none of this had anything to do with the real debate that should have taken place weeks earlier. No one really debated the question of national priorities and the place of the settlements in the country's economic priorities. No one really questioned the traditional political untouchables in the budget. And no one challenged Sharon's unwillingness to debate the settlement question even as polls showed that close to 80 per cent of Israelis support their evacuation.

What could have been a serious discussion about the merits of old-age pensions versus subsidies for settlements deteriorated into yet another, predictable game of political brinkmanship.

Moreover, Ben-Eliezer was exposed once again as a politician above all. His political agenda has been transparent and unconvincing. As a result, his actions may produce an unintended consequence, and may strengthen Ramon and Mitzna.

The deciding date for Labor's leadership vote is Nov. 19. Even if the government serves its full term until fall 2003, the next several months will be far more volatile in Israeli politics.

Jews, U.S. politics and the left

The tragic and untimely death last month of Minnesota Senator Paul Wellstone – a Jew and arguably the most liberal member of the U.S. Senate – provides a convenient opportunity to reflect on three features of American politics.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Perhaps the first thing to note about Wellstone, who died in a plane crash, is that he was an example of those successful Jewish American politicians who have been elected in jurisdictions where Jews and Jewish interests were few and far between. This set him apart from those Jews who have directly represented Jews and their interests in jurisdictions in the northeast, Florida or California.

There are an estimated 45,000 Jews in Minnesota, so clearly Wellstone's success owed nothing to "the Jewish vote." The same could be said for Senator Joe Lieberman from Connecticut, where the Jewish population is estimated at around three per cent. American Jews are accepted by non-Jewish voters and political party insiders – in my view, to a greater extent than is the case in Canada.

The second thing to note is that, throughout his political career, Wellstone embodied the challenge of juggling commitments to liberalism and commitments to Israel. In fact, he seemed to have oscillated over his career in his degree of support for Israel; his consuming passion was always the liberal domestic agenda. Some in the Jewish community felt he was the ideal progressive supporter of Israel, and on most votes on the issue, – for example, on aid to Israel – he proved reliable.

But others in the Jewish community have highlighted his support of Palestinian rights, his criticism of specific Israeli policies and most recently, his opposition to a unilateral American strike at Iraq. Thus, some Jewish support apparently shifted to his Republican rival in what would have been a tight race for his third term in the Senate. But certainly, testimonials from many leaders of the Minnesota and national Jewish communities indicate significant support.

Indeed, in these difficult times for Israel, where so many in the liberal and academic communities seem all too eager to single out Israel for disproportionate criticism, progressives like Wellstone played a useful strategic role in setting limits to the erosion of support for the Jewish State.

No analyst of Jewish life would have predicted 30 years ago that conservatives and fundamentalist Christians today would be stronger in support for Israel than liberal academics and political activists. Wellstone and others like him were tactically helpful in restoring a balance in pro-Israel support.

The third thing to note about Wellstone is his liberalism on many domestic economic and social issues, which signalled that Jews continue to resist the neo-conservative political agenda. Wellstone likely reminded wavering Jewish Democrats of their roots in the party.

While a minority of liberal Jews might share all of Wellstone's highly progressive positions, his views do resonate with a vocal Jewish constituency. Pundits have been waiting for Jews en masse, as they enter the ranks of the middle and upper-middle class, to abandon domestic liberalism. In the United States, that would mean shifting from the Democrats to the Republicans.

So far that has not happened. If it does, it will be caused not by domestic shifts, but by the force of international conflicts.

Jewish support for Israel, even progressive support for a secure Jewish Israel alongside a Palestinian state, will lead to friction with liberals and the growing numbers of Arab Americans. This will complement tensions with American blacks on affirmative action and other issues. Perceived Jewish support for intervention in Iraq (in fact, Jewish communal leadership is split on the issue) would also alienate these same liberal groups in the United States.

The ability of someone like Paul Wellstone to build political bridges on the left side of the political spectrum will be an increasingly useful talent for supporters of Israel and Jewish interests in what may be a tumultuous future. And not just in the United States.

The Kirshner File

Anti-Jewish decrees enjoyed support

Two scholars, in major works published recently, prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that Adolf Hitler's anti-Semitic policies enjoyed widespread support in Germany.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Ian Kershaw, in the second volume of his massive, universally acclaimed biography, Hitler (W.W. Norton), writes that the "shrill anti-Semitism" espoused by the Nazis "was no barrier" to Hitler's popularity among the vast majority of Germans. As he puts it: "The Jews had few friends. Even [Germans] who might criticize overt Nazi violence... were often infected by some form of resentment, envy, or suspicion of the Jews."

In short, the anti-Jewish premises of Hitler's regime, magnified by incessant propaganda, touched all levels of society.

Robert Gellately, in Backing Hitler (Oxford University Press), claims that Hitler tailored his anti-Jewish decrees "to fit public opinion."

Quoting a fellow scholar, David Bankier, he concludes that the prosecution of Jews depended, to a large extent, "on the public's reaction."

Kershaw, a British historian, suggests that admiration for Hitler was widespread, and that most Germans turned a blind eye to his excesses in the interests of achieving what they considered as Germany's national revival after the bitter defeat of World War I.

Given Hitler's obsessive hatred of Jews, it may come as a surprise to learn that he seldom spoke directly on the subject, and that he left it to like-minded aides, such as propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, to flesh out his anti-Semitic fantasies. According to Kershaw, Hitler set the tone and provided the sanction for the action of others.

Drawing on the anti-Semitism embedded in German society, the Nazis redoubled their efforts to rid Germany of Jews once the 1936 summer Olympic Games in Berlin had ended. "The Jews must get out of Germany, yes out of the whole of Europe," Goebbels wrote in his diary. "The Fuhrer is firmly decided on it."

Having already deprived Jews of German citizenship, Hitler launched a concerted campaign to "aryanize" Jewish properties. By April 1938, the task was well on its way toward completion. Jewish businessmen were forced to sell their companies for a pittance, and the main beneficiaries were competitors and corrupt Nazi party functionaries.

During the summer of that momentous year, party activists focused increasingly on vandalizing Jewish cemeteries and synagogues. As the anti-Semitic frenzy gathered momentum, climaxing with Kristallnacht in November, Hitler took care not be be publicly associated with these crude events. Although he stirred up passions, he left it to subordinates to press the campaign against Jews.

Ordinary Germans, affected by the escalating climate of hatred and motivated by sheer greed, followed the party's lead and joined in the destruction and looting of Jewish property. However, as Kershaw points out, many Germans were appalled by the scale and ferocity of Kristallnacht, from which Hitler publicly distanced himself and which he never discussed, even in private.

In a speech to the Reichstag on Jan. 30, 1939, Hitler foreshadowed his genocidal intentions with a dire warning.

"I want today to be a prophet again," he declared. "If international finance Jewry inside and outside Europe should succeed in plunging the nations once more into a world war, the result would be... the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."

Hitler's tirade notwithstanding, the Nazis toyed with the idea of finding a territorial solution to the so-called Jewish question. The regime briefly considered a plan to place four million Jews on the Indian Ocean island of Madagascar under strict SS control, but the scheme fell by the wayside.

Kershaw claims that Hitler' ideological objective of eradicating "Jewish Bolshevism," the central motif of his vision, was given immense impetus with Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union.

The murderous onslaught of the Einsatzgruppen, backed by the Wehrmacht, was a grisly forerunner of the industrialized murder of Jews in death camps. In this regard, Kershaw leaves no doubt that the Werhmacht aligned itself ideologically and operationally with Hitler's overriding goal.

Ruminating on the reasons why Germany moved from a policy of emigration to one of extermination, Kershaw fastens on the crisis of scarce food resources and the decision to deport German Jews.

As the need to ensure food supplies mounted, German civilian and military authorities pressed all the harder for savings to be made at the expense of enemies, particularly the Jews. And once the deportations got under way, local and regional Nazi leaders seized on the opportunity to "solve" the Jewish problem once and for all.

Even so, Kershaw adds, there was still no co-ordinated, comprehensive program of genocide. But with the Wannsee conference of January 1942, "the final solution of the European Jewish question" was settled. By the spring and summer of 1942, Belzec and Auschwitz were in full swing.

The first clumsy steps toward industrialized murder were, in fact, taken at Chelmno in December 1941, when Jews were killed in gas vans. By the close of 1942, by the SS's own calculations, four million Jews had been murdered.

Although he did not attend the seminal meeting in Wannsee, Hitler's responsibility for the Holocaust is unquestioned, and Kershaw is hardly surprised by his absence.

"He was consistently keen to conceal the traces of his involvement in the murder of Jews," Kershaw observes, speculating that Hitler feared Jewish revenge.

Adolf Hitler

As well, Hitler concluded that common knowledge of the Holocaust might stir up unrest in Germany and its occupied territories. The Nazi leadership, Kershaw says, believed that the German people were not ready for the gross inhumanity of the systematic slaying of Jews. Yet SS commandant Heinrich Himmler had no such compunctions. In 1943, in Posen, Poland, he openly described the Holocaust as "a glorious page in our history."

In Kershaw's estimation, Goebbels played no small role in pushing for a "radical solution." Be that as it may, it was the Security Police, headed by Reinhard Heydrich, that was instrumental in converting a genocidal impulse into a viable extermination plan.

Hitler, though, was the architect and prime mover of the Holocaust. Of that there is no doubt.

***

In a masterful book, Gellately, an American historian, says that most Germans lined up behind Hitler even though he never won an outright majority in an election.

Despite having created a dictatorship, Hitler wanted the support of the people. He went about achieving this by drastically reducing unemployment and by reasserting German power and pride. As a reward for such accomplishments, the great majority of Germans supported him.

Hitler, to be sure, tapped into an anti-Semitic tradition. But, as the short-lived 1933 economic boycott against German Jews showed, many Germans were not as zealously anti-Jewish as their leaders, at least at the outset.

The dismissal of Jewish university professors, however, was well received, as was the forced resignations of Jewish doctors by national and local medical associations.

Brilliant in public relations, the Nazis made it appear as if Germany was in the forefront of a broader international anti-Semitic movement.

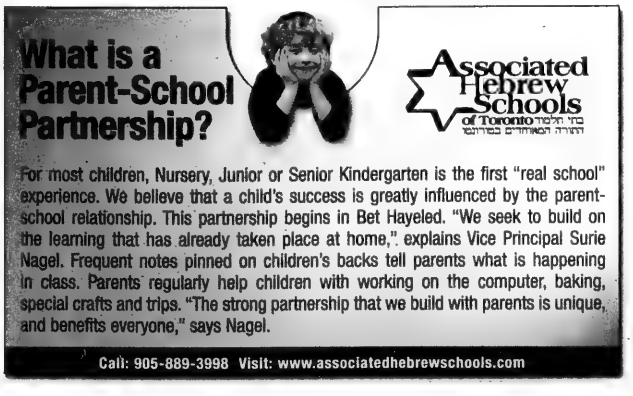
Hitler reinforced anti-Jewish prejudices by deliberately linking Jews with communism and race defilement. Jud Suess, an anti-Semitic film seen by an estimated 20 million Germans, maliciously conveyed Nazi distortions about Jews.

With the outbreak of World War II, for which Jews were repeatedly blamed, the pace of anti-Semitic propaganda accelerated. Although there was no replay of Kristallnacht, the regime increased pressure on the remaining Jews, cutting off their food and fuel supplies and making it mandatory to wear the yellow star.

Meanwhile, Nazi newspapers justified the ghettoization of Jews in Eastern Europe, claiming they were spreaders of disease, hoarders of goods and profiteers.

Gellately is convinced that, without the active collaboration of ordinary Germans, the Gestapo would have found it difficult to enforce the race laws.

Although support for Hitler and Nazism waned as the war encroached on the lives of Germans, morale held. In general, the German people rallied behind the regime, even as it committed unprecedented and unparalleled crimes against humanity.



What is a Parent-School Partnership?
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
For most children, Nursery, Junior or Senior Kindergarten is the first "real school" experience. We believe that a child's success is greatly influenced by the parent-school relationship. This partnership begins in Bet Hayeled. "We seek to build on the learning that has already taken place at home," explains Vice Principal Surie Nagel. Frequent notes pinned on children's backs tell parents what is happening in class. Parents regularly help children with working on the computer, baking, special crafts and trips. "The strong partnership that we build with parents is unique, and benefits everyone," says Nagel.

Nurturing the giftedness in children

Tikun Chaim, under the auspices of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), through a generous donation from the Berman Fund, is a new initiative to help organize a comprehensive network of special educational services for children throughout Toronto's Jewish community.

Following a call for proposals, more than 50 prospective projects were submitted. To date, funds for 27 initiatives have been approved including pre-school identification of children with learning problems, and the extension of innovative programs.

One project, Understanding Giftedness, is being implemented by Joanne Foster, who holds a doctorate from the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

The program was developed for professional staff who are interested in learning more about "giftedness" in children. The focus is on understanding the complexities associated with being a gifted/talented child, and different ways in which teachers can encourage and support high-ability learners.

Dr. Joanne Foster

"When speaking of special education, people generally think of children who require remedial help. This initiative pays attention to program applications for gifted/talented students," says Foster, 49, the mother of two children who attended Toronto day schools.

The project, launched during the August Teacher Centre Workshop with 28 teachers, was facilitated by Foster. Subsequently, she has conducted follow-up activities, such as classroom visits with the participants to observe teacher techniques and offer consultation services regarding their gifted/talented students.

"It's tricky because the needs of gifted/talented students, as with other children who have special needs, are completely unique," says Foster. "Teachers sometimes require help to maximize, nurture, and encourage students' giftedness by providing them with appropriate opportunities. They may have to modify or expand the curriculum."

"I acknowledge that we can and should advance teaching methodologies within our current day school system," adds Foster. "We must continue to ask more questions, and seek new and constructive ways to help others who work and live with gifted/talented children. Through Tikun Chaim that's exactly what we are doing and I'm excited to be a part of that."

Add Israel to your shopping list

In an effort to help Israel's troubled economy, a Toronto man, Joe Fox, has enlisted the aid of The Israel Now Consortium to encourage Toronto's Jewish community to buy Israeli products.

An umbrella organization spearheaded by UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel, the consortium is made up of more than 100 community organizations united in solidarity with Israel.

The Buy Israeli initiative urges consumers to simply look for the "made in Israel" label before making a purchase. Ads, flyers and UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto website (www.jewishtoronto.net) will publicize Israeli products and the stores selling them.

"The previous generation fought hard for the establishment of the State of Israel," says Fox. "It's incumbent on all of us to do what we can. All people really have to do to play a big role in helping Israel's economy is think about what they're buying before they reach the check-out counter."

For Fox, helping to bolster Israel's economy is somewhat hereditary.

His late mother, Goldie Fox, was extremely active in Montreal during the 1950s and 1960s with Hadassah, where she tried to expose Israeli goods and services to North America.

The Buy Israeli program encourages Toronto's Jewish community to purchase Israeli goods.

Fox has picked up his mother's baton and is hoping the Buy Israeli program will convince consumers that economically supporting Israel is not difficult.

That organized effort can be seen in many retail outlets around the GTA including Sobey's supermarket on Clark Avenue in Thornhill.

"We've had a lot of customers approach us lately, people concerned about having Israeli products advertised in our store," says Sobey's manager, Kevin Hopps. "Our customers want to support Israel and its economy. We recognize that people will be looking for those products. We have been promoting Israeli goods with in-store promotion and in our flyers."

From Generation to Generation

There was a special moment of nostalgia and emotion for Wendy Eisen and her daughter, Tammy Brown at the recent Lion of Judah Luncheon.

Wendy Eisen (r) pins her daughter, Tammy Brown.

Wendy placed a gold Lion of Judah pin belonging to her mother, Allie Herman, on daughter Tammy's lapel. Mrs. Herman was a member of the inaugural group of women who launched the Lion of Judah Division 17 years ago.

The pin – worn by women across North America who contribute a minimum of $5,000 to the annual UJA Federation campaign - has long been a symbol of commitment to the worldwide Jewish community ever since.

"My mother valued the leadership role she played in UJA," Wendy recalls. "She canvassed cards each year and was proud to be among the top contributors to the Women's campaign. 'We must give the way we live,' she would say, and with those words set the standard for our family. The pin was more than a piece of jewelry to my mother, it was a symbol of her commitment to Jewish survival."

"I remember attending a mother-daughter Lion of Judah tea with my mother and grandmother, in 1986. There I was inspired to become a Lion of Judah contributor one day," remarked Tammy who became Toronto's 75th Lion of Judah this year. "It is my honour, privilege and legacy to join this remarkable group of committed women. I will wear my grandmother's pin with a deep sense of pride and try to embody her values of generosity and tzedakah," she added.

Women's Campaign & Advocacy has assumed an increasingly significant role in raising funds for the annual UJA Federation campaign. Today, there are 14,000 Lions of Judah in the United States, 900 in Canada, and 464 in Toronto.

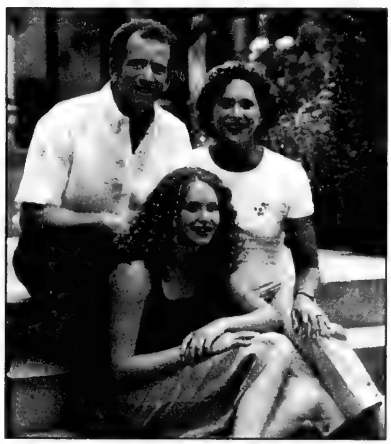
A very generous bat mitzvah gift

In September 2002, Torontonian Carrie Bregman celebrated her bat mitzvah, an event that will help make a difference for Israeli school children.

The daughter of Barbara and Michael Bregman, Carrie decided that her special day should be equally special for her Israeli peers. With that thought in mind, she asked her guests to make a donation to The Carrie Bregman Armoured School Bus Fund, through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The fund has already raised close to $34,000.



Recent bat mitzvah girl Carrie Bregman with her parents Michael and Barbara.

"I really wanted to help the kids in Israel who have to go to school every day worrying about terrorist attacks," says Carrie. "I never expected to raise this much money through my bat mitzvah, but it shows how much Toronto Jews care and love Israel, just like I do."

Carrie's father, Michael, who chaired UJA Federation Campaign 2002 along with David Koschitzky, says that the idea for the fund followed a UJA solidarity mission to Israel.

"I remember having had a meeting at UJA and discussing Israel's needs," recalls Michael. "I told Carrie about one of the biggest needs being armoured vehicles to transport Israel's school children. From that point on, it was completely her decision where she wanted the money to go. As a father, one of the proudest moments I've had is seeing my kids decide on their own to help Israelis," adds Michael.

In fact, Carrie's decision was largely based on the actions of two of her siblings. Her 19-year-old brother, Jacob, asked for bar mitzvah gifts to be placed in the Louis and Yetta Bregman Fund, in honour of his grandparents, at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital.

Sister Sarah, now 15, had her gifts sent to the Cardiac Critical Care Fund at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, to honour her two grandfathers.

Carrie's mom, Barbara, is understandably thrilled with her daughter's selfless decision.

"Obviously I'm proud and delighted," she says. "It was a choice that Michael and I gave our children. None of them, including Carrie, was legislated to do this; it was her own decision. I suppose it means that we, as parents, have done something right."

"To be honest," adds Carrie, "being able to do this for the kids in Israel was one of the best parts of my entire bat mitzvah. I hope other kids can do the same."

Assisting Israel's orphans

Toronto Jewry, through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, has been playing a crucial role in providing assistance to Israel's victims of terror since the Palestinian uprising began on September 28, 2000.

Now, Toronto's generosity is helping Israel's children who have lost one or both parents to terror.

UJA Federation, through the Jewish Agency, is providing funds to assist orphans in Israel.

Shortly after the wave of violence began, JAFI established the Fund for Victims of Terror, which has recently introduced additional assistance for children.

Thanks, in part to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, United Jewish Communities and Keren Hayesod, each child who qualifies for the fund will receive a special grant of $5,000 U.S. to be deposited in a savings plan for his/her use at the age of 21. The funds can remain in a savings account or used to pay for education, an apartment or a vehicle.

Campaign Celebration

An overflow crowd of 2,000 people participated in last week's UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 celebration at Toronto's Sheraton Centre. Close to $60 million has been raised so far. The keynote speaker for the evening was internationally renowned law professor Alan Dershowitz. For full details of the campaign celebration, please see next week's edition of The Canadian Jewish News.

Ralph Shedletsky (l), Chair of the Board of UJA Federation and a participant on the October 20th joint UJA Federation-Israel Bonds Solidarity Mission, presents former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu with a book of Canadiana. Close to 90 people participated in the mission.

Hana's tragic tale launches Holocaust Education Week

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

George Brady speaks warmly of his sister Hana's pretty round face, kind blue eyes and neatly brushed blonde hair.

He describes her skating along the ice during a brisk Czechoslovakian winter. And he reflects on Hana's unselfish character, explaining how she encouraged her mother to donate clothes to needy neighbours and how she always shared the family's treasured treat with her big brother on a Friday night – a piece of white cake.

"She always brought it to me because she thought I needed more," George says.

Hana was gassed to death in Auschwitz in 1944. She was 13 years old.

Nearly 60 years later, Hana's death, and indeed life, has spawned a transcontinental quest to educate, inspire and ultimately improve humanity.

Hana's story ushered in the beginning of Holocaust Education Week on Oct. 30.

Thousands filled the sanctuary at Beth Tzedec Congregation to listen to Brady, writer/film producer Karen Levine and Japanese Holocaust museum director Fumiko Ishioka describe how the suitcase Hana brought to the concentration camp has become a landmark in Holocaust education.

Although Holocaust education is not as widespread in Japan as North America, Ishioka has always taken a keen interest in it.

She told the Beth Tzedec audience how in November 1999 she went to Auschwitz and asked the museum to lend her some artifacts left by children who were imprisoned there.

She wanted to put the artifacts on display so that children at the Tokyo Holocaust Center could learn about the genocide.

"I asked for a suitcase because a suitcase really tells you the story of how children were transported from one place to another and were allowed to take only one suitcase," Ishioka said.

Three months later, a brown suitcase bearing the name Hana Brady, her birthday – May 16, 1931– and the German word for orphan, Waisenkind, arrived at the museum in Tokyo.

The children at the museum were in awe. They gravitated to the suitcase and wanted to learn more about Hana.

Ishioka was most curious of all. She began an odyssey, searching for every trace of Hana she could find.

With intractable perseverance, Ishioka began to piece together the puzzle of Hana's life during the Holocaust.

"She went through a lot of problems and challenges to find out about Hana," Brady says. "But she did manage to."

She wrote letters, made phone calls and even went to Terezin, where Hana and her brother were held captive until 1944.

She discovered drawings made by Hana, which inspired children back in Japan to form a club called Small Wings. Members wrote letters and poems and drew pictures, which were used to educate others about the Holocaust and Hana's story.

There were many roadblocks and sad discoveries on Ishioka's journey. For instance, in Terezin, she found the chilling Nazi documents that listed Hana's name and a check mark beside it, indicating that she had been murdered.

But one name didn't have a check beside it. That was George Brady.

At the time, she didn't know if he was related to Hana, but Ishioka continued to search. She went to the Jewish Museum in Prague and employees there sent her to meet with Michaela Hajek, a bunkmate of George's at Terezin.

Hajek was still in touch with Brady and had his address. Astonished, Ishioka took it and began writing letters to Brady, who lives in Toronto. He wrote back.

"I just screamed and my hands were shaking," Ishioka recalls the day his letter first arrived.

"I was really excited to find out about Hana... But what really excited me is that Hana's brother survived."

Brady and Ishioka met in Toronto, where in January 2001, their story – Hana's Suitcase – was broadcast on CBC Radio.

The documentary was produced by Levine, who first learned about the story from an article in The CJN.

She has since written a children's book on this amazing real-life story, also called Hana's Suitcase.

The book has sold thousands of copies and is now available in France and will soon be available in the United Sates and Italy.

"It really is a very ordinary suitcase, but what an extraordinary story it tells," says Levine.

"It's the unusual mix of past devastation and hope for the future."

"I've always felt that I'm a well-adjusted person," says Brady, who built a successful plumbing business in Toronto and is now a grandfather of five, with number 6 on the way.

"But the one thing I couldn't get over is my sister Hana."

George says he felt responsible for Hana during the war and was deeply hurt when he learned of her death.

But recalling the past has both honoured Hana's memory and set in motion an impressive effort to educate the Japanese about the horrors of discrimination.

In March 2001, Brady went to Tokyo with his daughter, Lara Hana, to meet with the scores of Japanese children who have learned Hana's story.

"Hana's story now teaches tens of thousands of children," Brady says.

"I see that a terrible tragedy has turned into a very positive thing."

There's A Zoo Near You
It doesn't matter where you stay in Israel – Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Eilat or Haifa, there's a large, lively zoo virtually around the corner. Israel offers visitors a rare opportunity to meet animals unseen outside the Middle East or unknown beyond biblical days.
The Biblical Zoo (Tisch Family Zoological Gardens in Jerusalem) – Remember the Arabian oryx, the Persian fallow deer or the Nile crocodile? Not likely. They're animals cited in the Bible which would have become extinct if it weren't for the Biblical Zoo. This exciting, 62-acre, southwest Jerusalem animal preserve also houses dozens of additional endangered species from around the world. For more information, visit www.jerusalemzoo.org.il/english.
The Tel Aviv Safari – What began as a pet shop, established by a doctor who fled Nazi Germany in 1938, is now a thrilling drive-through zoo (there's also lots to see on foot) for mostly African animals in the attractive Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan. Be prepared for ostriches peeking inside your car and entertaining monkeys. Call 011.972.3.631.2181.
Gan Garoo – It's a play on words involving two languages – "gan", which is Hebrew for park and "garoo" from "kangaroo." Now you get the picture. Kangaroos in northern Israel. Improbable but true. This is a zoo dedicated to Australian animals, with hopping kangaroos, cuddly koalas and flying foxes. You'll find Gan Garoo southeast of Haifa. Contact 011.972.4.648.8060.
There's something for everyone in Israel, including many smaller zoos and nature reserves. All the more reason to visit our beautiful land as soon as you can. Your visit will make a significant difference to the people of Israel. For information on Israel travel options, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office.
After all, Israel is yours. So, please say I care and I'm going.

NEW PREMISES: A mezuzah affixing ceremony was held at the new premises of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, 1000 Finch Ave. W., at a recent meeting with Dr. Steven Huberman, director of regional activities of USCJ. Rabbi Lau's term nears its end

Rabbi Lau has addressed young Palestinian would-be suicide bombers on Israeli television, in the hope his message would reach them. "Believe me as a religious leader," he tells them, "there cannot be a world to come for someone who kills his neighbours in this world. If it's so easy to inherit eternity by committing suicide, why don't the people who send you do it themselves?"

Yet the rabbi says that because of his personal background as a child survivor of the Holocaust and the Israeli history he's witnessed, he is very optimistic.

"We overcame many more difficult times and events, and we survived, so there is no reason to be afraid. It takes time, it costs blood, but our peace and security is 100 per cent sure. It's only a question of when shall we see the light at the end of the tunnel. I'm sure there is an end to this tunnel."

Robby Engel 1923 - 1999

Robby Engel and Queen Elizabeth II share something in common: both their faces graced a Canadian stamp.

Several years ago, Canada Post contacted UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto to borrow some artifacts for a new stamp commemorating the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II. When the stamp was issued later that year, Holocaust survivor Robby Engel's identity card photo appeared in the centre of its exquisite photographic collage.

"Robby was extremely proud of that stamp," says Margo, his wife of 54 years. "It was very exciting for the whole family."

Robby Engel was always front and centre when it came to Holocaust-related issues. When he retired from his longtime job as a fashion salesman, he devoted much of his time to helping younger generations understand what really went on during that horrific period in world history. Robby was an active volunteer with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, sharing his personal story with thousands of students who visited the museum every year. Every Fall on Anne Frank Day, Robby would help the local children plant tulip bulbs at Toronto's Amsterdam Square and tell his tale yet again, never frightening them but always telling the truth. He was active with the Holocaust Centre's Yom Hashoah Committee, served as chairman of the Holocaust Centre for five years, and was co-chair of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto's Holocaust Remembrance Committee.

"Robby was a very dedicated and passionate volunteer," recalls Holocaust Centre chair Howard Driman. "His daytimer was filled with information and invaluable contacts, positioning him as an amazing resource on anything that had to do with the Holocaust. If there was something Holocaust-related going on in the city, Robby was there. He felt it was very important that the story be told and remembered because there were many lessons to be learned. He was extremely inspirational."

Born in Berlin, Robby was just nine years old when his father died. Following 1938's tragic Kristallnacht, Robby's mother did what she could to protect her children, sending her 15-year-old son off to Holland on a kindertransport and escaping with her daughter to England. Little did she know that in 1942 Robby would be shipped off to Westerbork concentration camp, where he endured tremendous hardships until he was liberated by Canadian troops in 1945.

Soon after the war, Robby and Margo, whom he had met in Westerbork, were married and they settled in Amsterdam where their two daughters Renée and Evelyn were born. But with the Korean War starting and his daughters growing up, Robby knew it was time to move.

"Robby was liberated by Canadians so he loved the idea of going to Canada," says Margo. "He wanted a Jewish life for our children. He was very proud of being Jewish."

It was in Canada where Robby's volunteer work began in earnest, first in Montreal and then in Toronto. Having been a scout as a young boy, Robby continued this affiliation with Scouts Canada and the Toronto Star's Santa Claus Fund, organizing a troop of boy scouts to deliver several hundred gift boxes to needy families from a mini-depot in the Jewish Community Centre. He also busied himself with the Holocaust Centre and the Christian-Jewish Dialogue, never missing a chance to tell his story and teach children how much they could do to make the world a better place.

"Students thought Robby was very brave to be able to focus on the Holocaust for so many years," recalls Ada Wynston, chair of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue. "He didn't hold back anything. He never thought their questions were silly. Robby was extremely patient and the children loved him for it. He taught us all so much."

Adds Margo: "Robby was the eternal optimist in that he didn't know from hate. He liked to talk, he liked to joke, and he really touched everybody's heart."

Obituary Aviva Heller was a devoted and inspiring teacher

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Aviva Heller's family, friends, colleagues and students filled the Shaarei Shomayim sanctuary to show respect for a woman who believed that teaching is a commitment that goes beyond the classroom.

Heller, who taught at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for more than 30 years and headed its math department for 20, was the longest serving staff member at the school. She died Oct. 21 from cancer at age 61.

CHAT's director of guidance Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz said in a eulogy that it was Heller's "excellence as a teacher, her concern for her classes and her dedication to her students" that earned her the respect of everyone she knew.

The school closed so the CHAT family could attend her funeral at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where she and her late husband, Ron, were one of the early founders of its downstairs minyan 33 years ago, Rabbi Sacknovitz told The CJN.

Aviva Heller

"What will that row in shul be like without Aviva there every Shabbos and Yom Tov?" he asked in the eulogy.

As a young woman, Heller chose a career in math and education over a degree in engineering, insisting that teaching wasn't her second choice, Rabbi Sacknovitz said. "Being in the classroom was something she truly loved."

She also provided guidance and inspiration for the female students in her classes who were often told by others that "girls aren't good at math."

Heller took teaching to a different level because she cared so much about each student, former CHAT student Matya Gilbert-Schachter said in a phone interview.

Currently studying physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston, Gilbert-Schachter described the hours Heller would devote during lunch breaks, weekends and after school to help him prepare for math competitions.

During his eulogy, her son Jay noted that her alumni – numbering in the thousands – are everywhere.

"All of them, but particularly those who struggled with math and received special care and attention from her, carry with them a bit of her enthusiastic, yet carefully disciplined, approach."

Colleague and teacher Diane Pasian said that you only had to go into any one of her classrooms "to see how absolutely dedicated she was to her students."

Even the "logic and order of her handwriting on the boards was magical," Pasian said.

Heller was a lifelong supporter of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and a fund-raiser for Jewish Family & Child Services.

She was a woman with boundless energy – staying up grading exams until midnight or preparing meals late Thursday night so the family could enjoy Shabbat together, Heller's younger son Hart said.

"All her students were aware of her devotion," Hart told The CJN, adding that she never let her three children see how tough it must have been to be a single parent.

In his eulogy, Jay added that "her ability to demonstrate strength and courage to others came through most dramatically 18 years ago, when the sudden death of my father left her to raise three teenage children by herself.

"Though she must have felt scared and lonely at the prospect of taking on this challenge, Susan, Hart and I never saw it... Whatever demons she faced in those difficult years, she faced them alone and shielded her children from them."

In trying to move forward, Jay said he would follow his mother's example. "for whenever she faced the death of someone close, she had a good cry, picked herself up and moved on."

Aviva Ruth Frisch Heller is survived by her children Susan, Jay and his wife Anita, and Hart, as well as her grandchildren, Ruven and Zev.

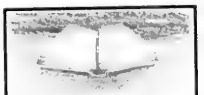
Rashi mystery reveals meaning of a mother's love

By RABBI LAWRENCE PINSKER

A few years ago a Jewish publisher issued a book titled What's Bothering Rashi? to introduce the work of Rabbi Shlomo ben Yitzhaki, the greatest medieval Torah commentator, to new readers. The books focuses on puzzling Torah texts and Rashi's explanations.



Rabbinic Reflections

Another category of Rashi notations might be called "The Rashi Mysteries" — texts that Rashi said he couldn't understand.

One such mystery appears near the end of this week's portion (chapter 28, verse 5). The Torah says: "Isaac sent Jacob away, and he went to Paddan-Aram to Laban, the son of Bethuel, the Aramean, the brother of Rebecca, Rebecca, mother of Jacob and Esau." Rashi's mystery is the words "Rivkah, eym Yaakov v'Eysav" – "Rebecca, mother of Jacob and Esau." Rashi writes: "I don't know what this teaches us."

But what's bothering Rashi?

It may be our collective familiarity with the story. Rashi wants us to note that it makes no sense for the text to repeat something we already know.

Rashi is operating under a principle of textual analysis laid down by the Sages a millennium earlier: any descriptive word or phrase that's added to amplify text that's already clear and fully defined isn't there as an ornament. If the text is sacred and its Author infinitely wise and in control of the material, then a redundant phrase in the Torah must have been inserted to teach us something important that we may have overlooked.

In "giving up" publicly, rather than silently skipping the verse (as he often does when he believes a meaning is obvious), Rashi asks us to find meaning in these words.

There are certainly many commentators that accept Rashi's challenge. One profound answer comes from Eliyahu ben Avraham Benamozegh, a 19th century Jew from a Moroccan merchant family living in Italy. Benamozegh's work brought together classical Jewish teachings and contemporary secular philosophy.

Heavily influenced by Jewish mysticism, Benamozegh taught that everyday life could be immeasurably enriched by a sense of the holy. He believed that beneath ordinary human relationships lies a realm of deeper meaning where one discovered holiness transforming the universe. For Benamozegh, Judaism is a statement of universal human truths linked to similar truths in other religions. By studying Judaism and its place among the great world religions, one can help solve the great questions troubling humanity.

In explaining Rashi's "mystery," Benamozegh says that Rebecca realized that, whichever of her children died, "I shall be wholly bereaved on that day – because one of you... will be dead – and then the murderer of his own brother will be detested by me both as enemy and stranger and in my eyes will be as though he were not alive. Thus will I be bereaved of both of you." The lesson is stunning: when one child is killed by a sibling, the mother loses both children.

Benanozegh's insight is brilliant: by referring to Rebecca as the mother of both Jacob and Esau, the Torah asks us to recognize that she wants to save not only Jacob but also Esau. She wants Jacob alive, but also wants to save Esau from becoming a murderer. Two lives are at stake. Though we've seen her throughout the story primarily as mother-protector to Jacob, she cannot forget that she is also Esau's mother.

Rashi's mystery is a beautiful acknowledgement that a mother's vision of her children's future is complex, and a model for true peace in the world that is our home. Shalom bayit – true peace – cannot be born out of the death or disappearance of one antagonist or the other. A mother's love – divine love – calls for a peace in which both parties survive.

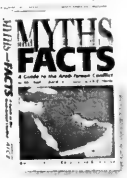
Jordan lost West Bank, attacked Jerusalem in 1967

MYTH:

The West Bank is part of Jordan.

FACT:

The West Bank was never legally part of Jordan. Under the United Nation's 1947 partition plan – which the Jews accepted and the Arabs rejected – it was to have been part of an independent Arab state in western Palestine. But the Jordanian army invaded and occupied it during the 1948 war. In 1950, Jordan annexed the West Bank.



Only two governments – Great Britain and Pakistan – formally recognized the Jordanian takeover. The rest of the world, including the United States, never did.

During the 1950-1967 period of its occupation, Jordan permitted terrorists to launch raids into Israel. Amman lost the West Bank after the Jordanian army entered the 1967 war.

MYTH:

During the Six-Day War, Israel attacked Jordan to capture Jerusalem.

FACT:

In June 1967, then-prime minister Levi Eshkol sent a message to King Hussein saying Israel would not attack Jordan unless he initiated hostilities. When Jordanian radar picked up a cluster of planes flying from Egypt to Israel, and the Egyptians convinced Hussein the planes were theirs, he ordered the shelling of West Jerusalem. It turned out the planes were Israel's, returning from destroying the Egyptian air force on the ground. Meanwhile, Syrian and Iraqi troops attacked Israel's northern frontier.

Had Jordan not attacked, the status of Jerusalem would not have changed during the course of the war. Once the city came under fire, however, Israel defended it, and, in doing so, took the opportunity to unify it.

Toronto chazzan part of solidarity mission

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

On Sunday, Nov. 17, 50 North American cantors will travel to Israel on a solidarity mission.

Cantor Beny Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, the only Canadian to participate in this first-of-its-kind cantors' mission, says "the unique aspect of this trip is the bonding of our Jewish souls through music and to demonstrate our love for Israel and its people."

Cantor Beny Maissner

Cantor Jack Chomsky of Congregation Tifereth Israel in Columbus, Ohio, who represents the Cantors Assembly of the Conservative movement, and Cantor Yvon Shore of the Reform congregation Temple Bet El in Hillsboro, N.J., are the mission's organizers.

"As chazzanim praying with and on behalf of our people," says Maissner, "we have the unique opportunity and privilege of intoning the sacred words of our liturgy and we hope to reach the high heavens with our voices in prayer."

Plans for the mission, which runs until Friday, Nov. 22 include high-level meetings with leading Israeli officials and leaders, including members of Knesset and Israeli mayors, some in conjunction with the Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The cantors will also perform at community concerts, visit terror victims in hospitals and visit bereaved families.

Maissner emphasizes that this and other missions strengthen the bonds between world Jewry and Israel.

"We hope to bring some comfort and sympathy to the pained Israeli society," he says. "As well, we hope to bring back to our communities the message of solidarity and unity with our people in Israel."

Cantors from all over the United States, including, New York, Los Angeles, Florida, Ohio, and Georgia, will be participating in the mission.

Chomsky says much of the trip will be taped to help promote further trips to Israel.

Following the mission, cantors who are able to remain in Israel for Shabbat, will be participating in services in Masorti (Conservative) and Reform congregations throughout Israel.

"We hope to teach the values of Judaism through the music of our people," says Maissner. "In doing so, through the prayers from our souls, we hope to bring the message of sympathy and solidarity to our brothers and sisters in Israel."

He adds that "steps have been taken in the Toronto community to build a cross-denominational unity– to bring together all segments of our community – steps of inclusion. I hope that this will lead to more unified activities in Toronto and increased missions to Israel."

Jewish books & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It doesn't compare to dropping by your favourite Jewish bookshop and rummaging through the new releases. But the World Wide Web does offer some treats for Jewish book lovers. On the Internet, you can find a community of people with similar interests, recommendations for good reads, and believe it or not, complete Jewish books that you can read at no cost.

First, the free books. Don't expect to find any hot, new Jewish releases on the Web. In fact, because of copyright restrictions, these books are either over 75 years old or they are by contemporary authors who want to make their works available freely. The quality of writing and interest for a general audience can vary widely. But, hey, the price is right.

The best place to start your quest is at The Online Books Page. This is a directory that points to the over 17,000 various types of books that can be read on the Internet. [http://onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu/] The site's Jewish Section has links to 60 online books including The Jewish Encyclopedia (1906), The Legends of the Jews (1909) by Louis Ginzberg, translated by Henrietta Szold and Paul Radin, and a book titled Judaic Logic: A Formal Analysis of Biblical, Talmudic and Rabbinic Logic (1997) by Avi Sion. [http://onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu/webbin/book/subjectstart?BM] You should also try the Web site's search page using terms like "Jew," "Jewish," "Israel" or other favourite keywords. To find more books online, visit the Project Gutenberg Web site. That's where I came across the Jewish Poems of Emma Lazarus. [http://www.gutenberg.net/]

Most books are too long to be read online. You will usually have to download the files onto your computer, expand them and then read them.

If you are able to read Hebrew in your browser, then check out Project Ben-Yehuda. [http://benyehuda.org/e_faq.html] Similar to Project Gutenberg, this site is devoted to bringing "the classics of Hebrew literature [poetry and prose at first, and then essays etc.] to the reader of Hebrew." The Project Ben-Yehuda links page will take you to other Hebrew literary sites. [http://benyehu da.org/h_links.html] (There are also many wonderful online editions of the Torah, the Tanach and other religious texts which I will look at in future columns.)

Of course, if you want to read most recent Jewish books, you are going to have buy or borrow them. Looking for recommendations? A site called Jewish Bibliographies on the Internet has scoured the Web for recommended reading lists about a wide variety of topics. You will find links to bibliographies on more than 25 topics including basic readings in Jewish history, lists on bestsellers, Ethiopian Jews, terrorism, Jewish travel, the Holocaust and a guide to books about life in the Jewish resorts of the Catskill mountains. [http://www.nmmc.net/Guide/bibliography.links.html]

If you've been scratching your head about the right book to buy a bar or bat mitzvah, check out the recommendations at the Books4JewishTeens site. [http://shlk.com/203]

Once you are ready to buy, you can either try your local bookshop or look for your book online. Whether you are shopping at Jewish specialty sites such as Israel's Judaica [http://israelsjudaica.com], Negev Judaica [http://negevjudaica.com] and MyJewishBooks.com [http://myjewishbooks.com] or general retailers like Chapters.Indigo.ca [http://chapters.indigo.ca] and Amazon [http://amazon.ca] always make sure that you understand the site's security provisions and return policies.

For more Jewish publishers, check out the links at the Maven Web site. [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=191] And for lively criticism, argument and discussion, don't miss JBooks.com. [http://www.jbooks.com/]

If you prefer to borrow Jewish books but don't have a good selection in your local library, then take a look at what the members of Kona Beth Shalom of Hawaii have done. Members are encouraged to make a list of their personal libraries and post them on the synagogue Web site. Friends browse through the lists, e-mail their requests and pick up the books at the next Shabbat service. [http://www.konabethshalom.org/library.htm]

Even if you aren't planning to visit Hawaii, check out their Web site for ideas about setting up a virtual library for your synagogue, temple or Jewish group.

North York woman saves elephants at Chile conference

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

At 39, Lisa Abram is too young to be heading south this November, but that's exactly where she's going. Unlike most "snowbirds," she's not stopping in Palm Beach or Miami. She's on a journey of passion, all the way to Latin America.

Abram, who has a background in marketing and a master's degree in environmental studies, is currently off in Chile campaigning for elephants at the UN Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES), from Nov. 3 to 15.

An international agreement between governments, CITES works to ensure that international trade in specimens of wild animals and plants does not threaten their survival. At the convention, delegates from 160 countries will lobby to include a variety of species on the official worldwide endangered lists. Abram is attending as a representative of the non-governmental organization (NGO) African Elephant International.

Abram has been smitten with elephants since she vacationed in Africa in 1989. She has returned to the continent at every opportunity she has had since then, between destinations like India, Asia and the South American rainforest.

CITES is her latest work with her favourite animal species, but her passion for the environment doesn't stop with elephants. For her master's thesis, she travelled to British Columbia to study native areas imperiled by logging.

Her conclusion: environmental tourism, incorporating local indigenous peoples, is crucial to saving precious ecosystems, whether in Western Canada or Africa: "Instead of elephants, it's bears... instead of Masai Mara, it's the Haisla [Natives]... but it's the same theme," she says.

Abram is confident that her calling embodies the mitzvah of tikkun olam, even though she often finds it difficult convincing fellow Jews of the importance of her work.

Last year, she says, she attended a Negev dinner with her parents, where "We had nametags... Mine just said 'global citizen.'

"If we're all about... repairing the world, it doesn't matter where we do it," she says.

Abram finds other frustrations in working to protect the environment, including the difficulties of having "normal" social interaction. She recalls one man she met who insisted he couldn't date anyone who wouldn't wear perfume. Often, she says, she feels like an outcast because she is a "minimalist, not into clothing, shopping. I don't even have a car anymore."

But it's not all frustrating. Her parents, though their lives are drastically different from her own – she says they live in the suburbs rather than downtown, have regular 9-5 jobs and are "major supporters of Jewish organizations like JNF [Jewish National Fund]" – are supportive. And she finds inspiration in the worldwide programs of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

"There aren't any boundaries in this field," she says.

She credits Avrum Rosenzweig, the organization's executive vice-president, with helping her to see "there are other ways of being a Jew" outside the typical mould.

Abram has also been influenced by Simcha Jacobovici and the small Orthodox synagogue he helped found in the Riverdale neighbourhood. There, she says, she can attend casually; "even in jeans." She also cites Jews for Judaism's Rabbi Michael Skobac as a role model: "You've gotta love a rabbi who's been to India!"

She went to Rabbi Skobac to seek "like-minded people" that she could socialize with. She attended a dinner that he and his wife, Chashi, organized, called a "Wandering Jews Shabbat Dinner."

Ten Jewish world travellers participated, reflecting a broad range of ages and beliefs. "At the end of the day, we were all there for the same purpose," she says.

Following CITES, Abram hopes to pursue environmentalism full-time; so far, all her work has been voluntary. She has a job in marketing to help finance her passion.

"Paying out of my own pocket [for her environmental activities] emphasizes how important I think these issues are," she says. Each new project she participates in "drives home why I want to do what I do."

But whatever Abram's future holds, it will involve travel.

"I have this inability to stop travelling," she says. "If I stopped, I'd probably wean myself off of this, and the world would close in... If I'd never gone outside of Bathurst [Street] and Steeles [Avenue], I wouldn't be the person I've evolved into."

Meanwhile, Abram says, her mother often glances uneasily at her wedding finger – where she wears a slim turquoise band and a metal ring with the name CUSCO, the Peruvian gateway to the ruins of Machu Picchu.

"When you walk this path, you have to be pretty convinced that it's what you want to do, or else you have the angst of your parents to deal with," she says. "You have to live the experience... not just try to save cute little animals.

"My mother wants me to get married and have kids. It would be nice, but I don't think I could do it and forget this side of my life."

Israel must be Jewish, democratic, says rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The survival of the Jewish state depends on stopping the rampant polarization between religious and secular, between the political right and left, and between Jews and Arabs, says Rabbi Yehuda Gilad.

Rabbi Gilad, 47, is spiritual leader of Kibbutz Lavi, a large religious kibbutz in northern Israel; founding rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Ma'ale Gilboa in Jerusalem; and since June, a member of the Knesset for the Meimad party.

Although that party espouses a modern Orthodox philosophy, it is loosely aligned with the ruling Labour party of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Through tolerance, understanding and communication, Rabbi Gilad said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto, we can create a state that is "Jewish and democratic," and fair to all.

Through the Rabin Foundation, which supports initiatives to engage Israelis and Arabs in dialogue, she and a group of like-minded individuals have created the Kineret Declaration, a covenant that sets out bases for developing the kind of state that would have a place for everyone.

Among the clauses are commitments to maintain the moral, national and religious underpinnings of the state; to ensure the rights of the Arab minority; to support the peace process and recognize the legitimate rights of the neighbouring Palestinian people, on condition that it recognize the legitimate rights of the Jewish people; and to ensure equal opportunity to all its citizens.

Compromise is only solution

Speaking particularly about religion in Israel, he said the coercion that the haredi parties have exercised has served only to drive the secular farther and farther away from them as well as from religious observance.

Compromise is the only solution, he said. For instance, he suggested, public institutions and events must be kosher and Sabbath observant, in accordance with Halachah. The same requirements, however, need not necessarily apply in the private sector.

"We are developing the understanding that we can't use force – it is only leading to people becoming even less religious."

There must be a distinction between business and culture, he said. He and his party want to create a consensus to keep malls closed on Shabbat.

"That's not just a religious issue, though. It's also a matter of equality so that the Orthodox can compete in business on an equal level with the secular."

On the other hand, the rabbi said, he would support allowing entertainment and cultural opportunities to be open on Shabbat. "I may not approve [of going to movies on Shabbat], but it isn't fair of me to force my views on other people."

This approach is finding favour with the non-religious, he said, who appreciate the spirit of compromise and respect that lies behind these views. Shas and the other religious parties, Rabbi Gilad said, "won't actively support the ideas, but won't oppose them either."

He and the Meimad party support the current peace initiatives, he said. "The Torah says that it is acceptable to give up land for peace."

In their view, the settlements and areas near the Green Line will be annexed to Israel, and the state should be ready to give up the rest of them.
